*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): Consul General Crowe has obtained a partial list of the British prisoners in Boer hands. This was forwarded by telegraph and published to-day. Consul Crowe has been instructed to forward by cable any further names which he may obtain. The War Office has no official information as to the health of the prisoners, but is aware that Consul Crowe has taken active steps to supply them with medicines, necessaries, clothing, and money. The latest information which has reached the Government points to a general amelioration of their condition.

ROODEVAL ENGAGEMENT, 7TH JUNE —CAPTURE OF THE DERBYSHIRE BATTALION.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain why the account, now in the possession of the War Office, giving the details of the surrender of the 4th Battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment, has been withheld from publication.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer given yesterday by the first Lord of the Treasury to the Leader of the Opposition.†

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then am I to understand that these documents will be furnished in due course? That was the trend of the First Lord's reply.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am, perhaps, venturing too much in speaking only from memory, but I think my right hon. friend said that he would confer with the Secretary of State as to the publication of the despatches.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: May I ask the First Lord whether he did not say yesterday that these documents would be published in due course?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is an irregular question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I knew it was.

ROODEVAL ENGAGEMENT—RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DISASTER.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it was the absolute duty of Lord Methuen to guard the railway between Roodeval and America, which was destroyed by the Boer forces in the raid upon the line of communications in which the 4th Battalion of the Sherwood Foresters were surrounded and taken prisoners on the 7th June; whether Lord Methuen with a reconstituted division was upwards of twenty miles from the scene of the raid on the railway, and had temporarily abandoned the task of guarding the railway in order to take supplies to General Colville at Heilbron; and whether it is proposed to hold an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the officer or officers to whom the responsibity of the rout and surrender of a whole battalion at Roodeval appertains.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am unable to answer the first two questions. With regard to the third, it is for Lord Roberts to decide whether an investigation is necessary.

GENERAL COLVILLE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether General Colville has been removed from his command in South Africa; and, if so, upon what grounds.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No information has been received on this subject in the War Office.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the Secretary of State make inquiries, or will it be left to the discretion of Lord Roberts?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member must have gathered that it is not the policy of the Government to ask Lord Roberts for an explanation of every piece of telegraphic news the meaning of which is not immediately apparent.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I will put a question to the First Lord on Monday.

ORANGE RIVER COLONY AND PENNY POSTAGE.

*MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether instructions will be given without delay to reduce the postage of letters to all persons in the Orange River Colony to one penny per half-ounce.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The Postmaster General is awaiting the decision of Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

PATRIOTIC FUND—WIDOWS' ALLOWANCES.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that since the Report of the Committee on the various War Funds was issued the Patriotic Commissioners have reduced the allowance of 5s. per week given by them to widows previous to such Report to the sum of 3s. per week; and whether, as the Committee contemplated, as is shown in the Report, that larger rather than smaller sums should be granted by the Patriotic Commissioners, the Government are prepared to advise the abolition of the said Commissioners, and whether the Government are willing to provide adequately for the wives and dependents of those who lose their lives in the service of their country.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am in receipt of a communication from the Commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund, which deals with the third part of my hon. friend's question. The Commissioners say that the widows placed on the Transvaal War Fund have not had any different treatment meted out to them since the issue of the Report of the War Funds Commission. A small proportion of the total number of widows on the fund have had their allowances altered both before and since the issue of the Report by reason of their having been granted permanent annuities of a substantial character from overlapping local funds; and it would be unfair to other widows if such further allowances were not taken into account by the Commissioners. But the Commissioners have undertaken to frame a scheme of allowances for all widows when the war is over, and when the number of applications has been definitely ascertained. As to the second paragraph of my hon. friend's question, he is probably aware that the Government have pledged themselves to deal with the question of making provision for all widows and orphans.

MR. GALLOWAY: May I ask whether that is the answer of the Patriotic Commissioners or of the right hon. Gentleman's own? Because, in the former case, I take leave to question its accuracy.

[No answer was given.]

UNDER-AGE RECRUITS—CASE OF PATRICK WALSH.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a boy named Patrick Walsh, whose regimental number is 6,106, enlisted in the 1st Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers in October, 1898, and that prior to his last enlistment he joined the Army, but was discharged in March, 1898, being then under fourteen years of age; whether he can state if Patrick Walsh is now serving as a soldier in South Africa; and whether, seeing that he is now only sixteen years old, his immediate discharge from the Army will be granted in accordance with the request of his parents.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The facts are as stated by the hon. Member. When they were made known to the War Office last November a letter was sent to the General Officer commanding the Cork district, in which his attention was called to the case, and explanations from the officers concerned were demanded. These explanations were received. The Approving Officer expresses unqualified regret, and states in extenuation that Private Walsh when enlisted presented the appearance of maturity. He further states that he has often had occasion to question the correctness of birth certificates, and has even been in correspondence with the Registrar General in Ireland on the subject. The medical officer is so strongly of the same opinion with regard to the maturity of the youth he examined that he believes personation has taken place. The recruiting officer admits the possibility of error, and points out that in 1899 500 recruits were accepted and 300 rejected in his district, and that Walsh's name is a very common one in Listowel, where he was enlisted. It is an unsatisfactory case The boy seems to have been determined to enter the Army, and as he is now in South Africa it is impossible to discharge him before the end of the war; but his father has been been directed to apply again as soon as the war is over.

MR. FLAVIN: Has a boy fourteen years of age arrived at maturity for war purposes? Why was information refused to his parents when they applied at the War Office?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The question raises the points with which I have attempted to deal. The boy's height, weight, and chest measurement were all abnormal, so that it was easy to mistake his age.

MR. FLAVIN: He must be valuable for the front, then.

LONDON TELEGRAPHIST VOLUNTEERS—CAMP LEAVE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that members of the London Scottish Volunteers who are employed at the Central Telegraph Office, London, have been refused leave of absence to attend camps of military instruction; and will he have inquiry made into the matter with a view to a short term of leave being granted.

MR. HANBURY: Every effort is made to enable officers of the Post Office who are Volunteers to attend camps of instruction this year; but owing to the large number of officers who have been withdrawn for service in South Africa, it is not possible, with due regard to the exigencies of the service, to allow more than a limited number to go.

INTERNATIONAL FISHERIES CONFERENCE AT STOCKHOLM.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British delegate to the International Fisheries Conference, held at Stockholm last year, has made any report of those proceedings to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether it will be issued as a Parliamentary Paper.

*MR. BRODRICK: A Report has been received and the question of its publication will be considered when the correspondence between the British and Swedish Governments has been concluded.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Swedish Government, some months ago, communicated to Her Majesty's Government, the other North Sea Powers, and Russia, that it accepted the programme of the International Fisheries Conference held at Stockholm last year, and is resolved, in case of agreement on the part of the other Governments interested, to ask from the Riksdag the funds necessary to carry it out; whether favourable replies have been received by the Swedish Government from the Governments of Norway and Germany concerning the co-operation proposed by the Stockholm Conference; and whether any, and, if so, what, reply has been made by Her Majesty's Government to this communication from the Swedish Government.

*MR. BRODRICK: As I stated in answer to a question on 1st May, communications are at present passing between the British and Swedish Governments with regard to the participation of Great Britain in certain investigations concerning the fishing industry which were recommended by the Conference. These communications are not yet completed, and I am therefore not able to make a more definite statement.

BRITISH SEA FISHERIES—ANADROMOUS FISHES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries have ascertained and have stated, at page 105 of their Report for 1897, that the diminution in the number of sea fish, such as cod and haddock, on the coasts of the United States is accompanied by a depletion of anadromous fishes, such as the salmon, which leave the sea at certain seasons for the rivers; and that it appears that any measures tending to restore the anadromous fishes to their former abundance will also improve the coast fisheries; and will he consider whether any steps can be taken to improve the sea fisheries of the English, Scotch, and Irish coasts by measures tending to restore the anadroms which frequent the rivers of Ireland.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): No, Sir, I am not. The passage which my hon. friend has quoted with some considerable approach to accuracy is an expression of opinion by Mr. Charles H. Stevenson, contained in an appendix to the Report for 1898 of the Commissioner for Fish and Fisheries. The question whether any measures can be taken to add to the number of anadroms in the rivers of Ireland is being at present considered by a Viceregal Commission. It is impossible for me to say whether any steps can be taken to improve the sea fisheries of the English, Scotch and Irish coasts by such measures until I know what such measures are.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman wait for the Report of that Commission before proceeding with the Undersized Fish Bill?

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir; that Bill does not deal with anadroms.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman say the direct connection between the scarcity of one and the scarcity of the other?

MR. RITCHIE did not reply.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say, for the information of Irish Members interested in fisheries, what an anadromous fish is?

MR. RITCHIE: It is a fish which lives sometimes in the sea and sometimes in the river.

LIGHTHOUSE COMMUNICATION—WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

SIR R. PENROSE-FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will be good enough to state whether communication between the East Goodwin light-vessel and the main land by wireless telegraphy, for life-saving purposes, is in working order; and, if not, whether he will explain the grounds of delay; and whether he is aware that the system in question is in constant use for life-saving and commercial purposes between the Borkum light-vessel, twenty miles from the receiving station on the main land.

MR. RITCHIE: The wireless telegraphy communication between the East Goodwin light-vessel and the mainland was established for experimental purposes only, and has now been discontinued. I am not aware of the exact nature of the system in use on the Borkum light-vessel. The question of using a system of wireless telegraphy for purposes of communication with lighthouses and light-vessels is before an Inter-Departmental Committee, who have very difficult questions of patent rights to consider.

RAILWAYS—COMMUNICATION WITH GUARD ON PASSENGER TRAINS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, having regard to the fact that the principal railway companies decided some time since to adopt the brake system of communication between railway passengers and the guard, will he state the names of the companies now using this system.

MR. RITCHIE: I am not in the possession of exhaustive information on the subject, but I will take steps to obtain it, and communicate with the hon. Member.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES AND CITIZENS' RIGHTS.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether there is any statute or regulation debarring Post Office servants, who are also officers of their trade unions, from exercising the right of approach to candidates for Parliament possessed by ordinary citizens and officials of other organisations.

MR. HANBURY: No distinction, of course, is drawn in this respect between a Post Office servant who is an officer of a trade union and one who is not. All Post Office servants, like all other members of the Civil Service of the Crown, are necessarily required to serve with equal fidelity under whatever political party may for the time be in power, and are therefore expected not to take any public part in supporting or opposing any particular candidate or party. This is specially necessary in the case of those who are brought into daily contact, in the discharge of their official duties, with all sections of the public, as most of the Post Office servants are. No statute and no regulation exists debarring any Post Office servant from approaching candidates for Parliament; but it is, of course, within the discretion of the Postmaster General, as it would be in the discretion of the head of any other Department of the State, to frame such a regulation if he considers it necessary in the public interest.

MR. STEADMAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman's answer refer to officials as well as members of trades unions?

MR. HANBURY: It applies to all in the Postal service, whether they belong to trades unions or not.

DELAY OF AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the delay in the transit of the Australian mails per Orient Steam Navigation Company's steamers from Naples to London; and whether the mails by the Orient steamer which arrived at Naples on Friday last have yet been delivered in London; and, if so, will he state when the mails left Naples and when they arrived in London.

MR. HANBURY: The transit through Italy and France of the Australian mails landed at Naples is the subject of special attention; and continued effort is made to prevent delay in that service. The last homeward Orient packet arrived at Naples not on Friday but on Saturday last, and the mails were despatched from Naples shortly before midnight. Through irregularities, however, in the Italian railway service they did not reach London till Tuesday night, and the London correspondence was delivered on Wednesday morning. Representations have been made to the Italian Post Office on the subject.

ESTATE DUTY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will issue instructions to the sheriff clerks in Scotland to receive the inventories and expede confirmations in favour of the executors of persons entitled to the benefits conferred by Section 14 of the Finance Act, 1900, without requiring estate duty to be first paid in all cases where the estate would otherwise be liable to the fixed duty of thirty shillings or fifty shillings, and thus imposing on the executors the burden of recovering this duty later on.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The procedure suggested would not be possible in cases falling under Section 14 of the Finance Act, 1900, as the remission therein provided is conditional upon the discretion of the Treasury acting upon a recommendation of the Secretary of State or of the Admiralty, and it would be obviously impossible for sheriff clerks to know antecedently whether such discretion would be exercised.

POSTAL FACILITIES IN SCOTTISH CONGESTED DISTRICTS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that under Section 4, sub-section (f), of the Congested Districts (Scotland) Act, the Congested Districts Board is empowered to provide guarantees for telegraph extensions or such other postal facilities (including money order and savings bank business) as may be within the power of the Postmaster General to grant under guarantee; and in view of the fact that in some parts of the congested districts the Postmaster General has not felt himself justified in granting the postal deliveries sought by the inhabitants on the ground that they might result in a loss to the Revenue, will he state whether he would consider the expediency of providing such facilities if the Congested Districts Board undertook to guarantee the Department against loss under the section above referred to.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware of the statutory provisions referred to. If the Congested Districts Board see fit to make any proposal in the sense indicated by the hon. Member it will receive the Postmaster General's careful consideration.

HIGHLAND LINE FISHING INDUSTRY.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland has received a memorial from the Lewis and Harris Association, and from nine other Highland associations, urging that the line fishing industry in Highland and Hebridean waters is imperfectly protected from the depredations of illegal trawlers, and, in view of the fact that the associations suggest that one or two swift boats, capable of putting to sea in any ordinary weather, should be placed on police duty round the shores of the Hebrides and adjacent mainland, will he state whether the Secretary for Scotland will consider the expediency of acting on the suggestion.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The memorial was received two days ago, and is under consideration, and a reply will be sent in due course.

STORNOWAY COMMISSIONERS' EDUCATION MEMORIAL.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Secretary for Scotland has received a memorial from the Stornoway Burgh Commissioners pointing out that under the Education (Scotland) Bill now before Parliament moneys which are now applied in relief of the rates will be used for the purpose of secondary education; and will he state what steps he proposes to take in regard to the Commissioners' suggestion that the Congested Districts Board should be empowered to apply a portion of the moneys at its disposal to the purposes of secondary education, so that congested areas, such as the parish of Stornoway and Island of Lewis, where the rates are higher than in other districts in Scotland, may be relieved of the increased burdens imposed by the Bill.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The Secretary for Scotland has received the memorial containing the suggestion for an Amendment to the Education Bill referred to by the hon. Member. It appears, however, to his Lordship that, apart from the merits of the proposal, it is not one which could readily be inserted in the Education Bill, but would require separate legislation, which he is not at this period of the session prepared to initiate.

POTATO-GROWING IN SCOTLAND.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, as representing the Secretary for Scotland, whether he is aware that experiments made by Mr. O'Sullivan, of Athea, county Limerick, show that the yield of a potato crop may be increased to the extent of 80 per cent.; and will he have some inquiries made into the matter with a view to similar experiments by the Congested Districts Board for Scotland.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: On the information supplied there does not seem sufficient evidence in favour of the proposal to come under any obligation regarding it.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): Seeing that the Irish Agricultural Department are inquiring, why should not the Scottish Board do the same?

MR. WEIR: Will the right hon. Gentleman obtain from the Irish Department any information it may have obtained?

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I have said there does not seem sufficient evidence to justify one coming under any obligation regarding it.

SCOTTISH FISHERY CRUISER.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state what progress is being made with the Fishery Board's new cruiser, and when she will be ready for service.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I am informed by the Fishery Board that satisfactory progress has been made with the new cruiser, and it is fully anticipated that she will be completed within the period mentioned in the contract—namely, the 20th December next.

DUBLIN SORTING OFFICE DUTIES.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the triple duty has been reintroduced in the Dublin sorting office, under a system by which officers perform three attendances, amounting in the aggregate to eight and a half or nine hours, the excess over eight hours being paid for as overtime; and whether an arrangement could be made to confine the number of attendances to two per day, in accordance with recent decisions, and in the event of a third attendance being necessary, the same to be paid for as overtime.

MR. HANBURY: The triple duty has not been reintroduced into the Dublin sorting office, but a few of the sorting clerks are occasionally required to attend three times a day in cases of exceptional pressure, and they are then paid at the usual rates for extra duty for all attendance in excess of eight hours, in accordance with the regulations. No departure from this rule would be warranted.

COOTEHILL (CAVAN) POST OFFICE.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state why the use of the old post office in Cootehill, county Cavan, has been discontinued; whether he is aware that the old office was confined to postal work, whilst the new office is part of an apothecary's shop; and can he say at what cost the fixtures of the office were removed, and by whom the cost will be borne.

MR. HANBURY: The use of the premises in which the post office business was formerly carried on at Cootehill has been discontinued because a new sub-postmaster has been appointed who does not reside on those premises. The former sub-postmistress carried on no other business than that of the post office, whilst the new sub-postmaster is a chemist—but provides proper accommodation for the post office work. The question whether the fixtures formerly in use should be taken over by the new sub-postmaster is entirely a matter for arrangement between the former and present holder of the appointment.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG: But why is the new postmaster to be allowed to carry on his business, whereas his predecessor had to give hers up and devote her whole time to the work of the post office?

MR. HANBURY: I am told that that is not the case, and that the late sub-postmistress had no business at all.

ROCKCORRY LICENSING SESSIONS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there was due compliance with the rule which requires publication of intention and notice to the police in the matter of a new licence or transfer of licence, in the case wherein Mr. Leslie, agent of the Dartrey estate, recently obtained a transfer at Rockcorry petty sessions; is he aware that the original applicant for this transfer was a person named Clarke, and that Mr. Leslie left the bench and had Clarke's name removed from the application and his own substituted; can he say whether Clarke or Mr. Leslie is the tenant of the premises to which the licence is attached; and, if Mr. Leslie, does that gentleman, in compliance with the requirements of the law, sleep on the premises; if Clarke, how can that person trade and receive spirits under permit in his own name while the licence is in the name of Leslie; can he explain why one of the magistrates who granted the permit was drawn from the Castleblayney petty sessions district, and had he power to act; and will any action be taken in this case.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): There was no obligation to give the police the notice referred to in the first paragraph, and the notice was not given. I have no information as to the second and third paragraphs. The magistrate referred to in the fourth paragraph is presumably Mr. McCabe. He is a justice for the county Monaghan. As I have already stated, the Executive do not propose to take any action in the matter.

BURIAL GROUNDS ON ARRAN ISLANDS.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the condition of the burial grounds in the Arran Islands, Galway; is he aware that the caretaker on one of the burial grounds instead of protecting it actually lets the grass for grazing purposes, and allows the wire fences put up at considerable expense by the local authority to be destroyed; can he state whether there is a caretaker for the second burial ground; whether it is the duty of the Local Government Board Inspector to visit these burial grounds from time to time and see that the public health is not endangered by their unsanitary condition; and how often the inspector has visited these islands during the last twelve months.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Representations have been made to the Local Government Board by the Rev. Mr. Farragher, P.P., respecting the condition of these burial grounds, and the Board are in communication with the Galway Rural District Council on the subject. The matters to which the rev. gentleman has drawn attention relate rather to defects in connection with the caretaking, such as the failure to paint the gates and to prevent injury to the wire fences, etc., and it has not been alleged that any danger to the public health is involved such as is suggested in the question. The matter is entirely one for the local authority to deal with, and the Board's inspectors do not visit local graveyards unless their attention is specially directed to their condition. I am unable to say how often the inspector visited the islands during the past year at such short notice.

LORD EMLY'S LIMERICK SPEECH.

*SIR J. COLOMB: On behalf of the hon. Member for the Torquay Division of Devonshire, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to a speech made by Lord Emly at Limerick on the 29th ult., which, if correctly reported, would constitute an incitement to commit a breach of the peace; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: My attention has been directed to a newspaper report of the speech in question, which, as reported, is of the character mentioned. The meeting at which the speech was delivered was, however, held indoors, and there is no evidence forthcoming of the language used on the occasion.

ENNISKILLEN CEMETERY.

MR. ARCHDALE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, prior to the Local Government Board Order of 15th May, 1899, the area of charge for maintenance of Enniskillen cemetery was not the electoral division of Enniskillen, which then comprised the present district electoral divisions of Enniskillen urban and Enniskillen rural, and that by Article 1 of the above Order the area of charge in future for the cemetery is Rural District No. 1, which does not comprise the district electoral division of Enniskillen urban, and as the Local Government Board have refused to alter that Order, will he take steps to include Enniskillen urban division in the chargeable area, as the cemetery has been since its opening used almost entirely by inhabitants of the said town, and was provided to meet their requirements, one of the town graveyards having been closed by order of the sanitary authority.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The graveyard is situated in the rural district, and is vested in the rural district council. The Board have been advised that the expenses incurred by the rural district council, as a burial board, should be charged on and paid out of the poor rates of the rural district. The Local Government Board cannot include the urban district in the area of charge so long as the burial ground remains the property of the rural district council. The rural and urban district councils have been advised by the Board to consider the question of transferring the cemetery to the urban district.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN CARRICKMACROSS UNION.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the arbitrator, in reference to the scheme of labourers' cottages in Carrickmacross Union, now nearly completed, made the following charges—namely, correspondence with clerk, one hour, 10s. 6d.; travelling, four hours, £2 2s.; rail to Carrickmacross, £1 1s. 4d.; one night from home, £1 1s.; hearing claims, ten hours, £3 3s.; inspecting sites and back to Belfast, nine hours, £3 3s.; making up valuation and forming award, six hours, £3 3s.; completing award, four hours, £2 2s.; whether he can explain why in one instance that the arbitrator charged 10s. 6d. per hour, and in another 6s. 4d. per hour, whether the arbitrator can charge what he pleases, and if he is a servant of the Government; and whether he can state if the Local Government Board received any of the money in the arbitrator's account charged to the Carrickmacross Board of Guardians, and whether he will inquire into these charges with a view to a refund.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The expenses of the arbitrator are accurately set forth in the first paragraph. The apparent discrepancy referred to in the second paragraph is thus explained: the usual fee is £3 3s. per day of not less than six hours, which is equivalent to 10s. 6d. per hour, whereas the arbitrator charged that fee in respect of one day of ten hours work, which was equivalent to 6s. 4d. per hour. The arbitrator's expenses are paid according to scale, and he cannot charge what he pleases. He is not a paid servant of the Government. The whole of the amount was paid to the arbitrator himself, and no portion was received by the Department. The guardians were invited to submit any objections to the payment of the account. Apparently, however, they considered the charges reasonable, for they at once paid the arbitrator the full amount of his claim. It is not intended to make any further inquiry in the matter.

CARRICKMACROSS INQUIRY—SHORTHAND WRITER'S FEES.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the shorthand writer charged the Carrickmacross Board of Guardians £25 5s. during the last inquiry in reference to the erection of labourers' cottages in that union; and whether he can state if the sum mentioned was charged by scale, or if he can explain how this account was made up.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The account referred to in the first paragraph was furnished in relation to an inquiry held in April, 1898. The charges made by the shorthand writer were strictly in accordance with scale.

EDUCATION—NEW SCHEME—POSITION OF INSPECTORS.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, as in the new scheme proposed by the National Board of Education in Ireland the six head inspectors are reduced to the same rank as sixteen of the subordinates who have been serving under them, he can state if this reduction also involves a loss in certain emoluments which attached to their office, and whether it is intended also to prevent the head inspectors in future from reaching the higher offices which have hitherto been open to them; and have the head inspectors protested against this change in the conditions upon which they entered the service, is it the intention of the Commission to compel them to accept the change without any compensation, and will the whole scheme of the Commissioners be laid before Parliament before being finally adopted.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The six head inspectors have not been reduced in rank, though their title has been altered and their sphere of duties somewhat changed; but sixteen district inspectors have been promoted to the same rank as the head inspectors. Both the salaries and the possible pensions of the head inspectors have been considerably increased. The old scale of salaries commenced at £500. The maximum was £600. The maximum of the new scale of their salaries is £700, an increase of £100 per annum, or 16·6 per cent. The highest possible pension a head inspector could obtain under the old scale was £400 per annum. Under the new scale he can obtain a pension of £466 13s. 4d., an increase of £66 13s. 4d per annum, or 16·6 per cent. No change has been made in the rates of travelling expenses or of personal allowance to these officers. It has never been contemplated that these allowances were to be a source of additional emolument to the officers receiving them, but were merely to cover actual expenses out of pocket. The Commissioners have made no new rules in regard to the higher offices in their gift, in the filling of which they have always exercised, and will continue to exercise, their own unfettered discretion. The head inspectors made certain representations to the Commissioners in regard to their change of title from head inspectors to that of senior inspectors, the contemplated changes in the duties to be in future assigned to them, and the possible loss of emoluments from perquisites derived from their allowances. These representations were fully considered. No change whatever has been made in the conditions under which those inspectors entered the service, except that, as already stated, their actual and prospective salaries have been improved. The change in the regulations regarding the inspectorate, which are for the benefit of all the inspectors (including the six officers referred to in the question), and also for the benefit of the great body of the teachers, have been carefully considered in detail by the Irish Government, the Treasury, and the Commissioners, and have been fully approved generally in connection with the entire new scheme.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): When will the new scheme be published?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I cannot say precisely.

MR. CLANCY: Will it be in the hands of hon. Members before the Vote is taken?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I will endeavour to secure that.

MR. CLANCY: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think it absolutely necessary that the Irish Members should be in possession of the scheme before they discuss the Vote?

[No answer was given.]

TEACHERS' REMUNERATION—RESULT FEES.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state if Irish National school teachers will be paid by way of usual result fees such sums of money as will compensate them fully for the educational instruction given by said teachers in their several schools as from the date of their last examinations up to the 31st March, 1900, between which dates they have received no result fees.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Results fees were abolished from the 31st March, 1900. Every teacher will, however, receive an equivalent payment for result fees that would have accrued up to the 31st March last had the results system continued in operation. This has been explained to the teachers and managers by a circular letter from the Education Office.

ARDSTRAW NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state upon what grounds payment of the salary of the assistant teacher of the National school at Ardstraw, in the county of Tyrone, which accrued between 1st October, 1898, and 1st January, 1899, was withheld, although the required average of sixty pupils was more than maintained during that period, and although payment of such salaries on an average of sixty pupils was sanctioned by the Treasury as from 1st October, 1898.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that the salary of the assistant teacher of the National school at Ardstraw for the quarter ended 31st December, 1898, has not been paid because the claim made by the manager was not from 1st October, but from 1st August, 1898, and such claim cannot be allowed. Before the 1st October, 1898, a quarterly average attendance of seventy pupils was required for recognition of an assistant, and this condition was not fulfilled. A claim for salary from 1st October, 1898, if made, will be favourably considered.

MUNSTER DAIRY SCHOOL AND AGRICULTURAL INSTITUTE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the meeting of the Munster Dairy School and Agricultural Institute at Cork on the 2nd instant; and whether, in view of the general testimony as to the valuable results in respect to the dairying industry brought about by the instruction given in that school and by the employment of itinerant dairy instructors, and of the statement of the President, the Department of Agriculture will undertake to give equal encouragement to the dairying industry as to the creamery system.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin Co., S.): Attention has been drawn to the report of the meeting held on 2nd instant in connection with the Munster Institute. The Department fully intends that in the development of the Institute every feature of its work which has been found of utility to the farming community, such as intinerant dairy instruction, will be continued. The Department will give due attention to all forms of the dairying industry.

IRISH PRISONS—SICK REGULATIONS.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, having regard to the fact that, as deposed to by Dr. Moriarty and also by Governor Andrews at the recent inquest on Andrew Cull, at Cork Prison, the doctor of a prison has the right to report to the Prisons Board that any prisoner suffering from ill-health should be discharged where the doctor believed further imprisonment would endanger the prisoner's life; whether, as also deposed to by the doctor, there were occasions when his recommendations for the discharge of prisoners because of ill-health were ignored by the Dublin Castle authorities; and will he cause inquiries to be made in this matter.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is the duty of the medical officer of a prison, when he considers a prisoner's life to be in danger by further confinement, to at once report his opinion to the Prisons Board. The medical officer of Cork Prison states he has recommended the discharge of one or two prisoners, although the Lord Lieutenant did not consider there were sufficient grounds for acting upon the recommendation. As I have already stated, the exercise of the power to discharge a prisoner is vested in the Lord Lieutenant alone, and the question whether a recommendation of the medical officer in this respect should be acted upon is one entirely for his Excellency's decision. I see no reasons for directing any further inquiry in the matter.

EVICTION ON THE WARDEN ESTATE.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what amount of arrears were due on the farm from which Hussey was evicted on the Warden property; whether the arrears due accrued during the tenancy of Hussey's predecessors; and whether he can state if Hussey, prior to his eviction by Mr. Warden, offered to pay twelve months arrears, and if so, whether this offer of Hussey was accepted by the landlord, and will he cause inquiry to be made in this case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The arrears due on the holding from which Hussey was evicted amounted to £11 12s. 6d. He had paid no rent, I believe, since he was put into the farm as sub-tenant. I have no information as to the last paragraph.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether this man did not offer twelve months arrears of rent?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have no information on that point.

MR. FLAVIN: I will repeat the question.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is of no use doing that. I have no power in the matter.

VALENCIA HARBOUR AND CAHERCIVEEN RIVER.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that inconvenience is caused to fishermen and injury to their boats for the want of a perch or buoy in the Caherciveen river, and that communications have taken place between fishermen in the district and several Government public boards in connection with this matter; and whether, seeing that Kerry County Council unanimously passed a resolution requesting the Government Department to take action in the matter, he will take such steps as may be necessary for the erection of the perch or buoy for the better security of fishermen and their boats. I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Kerry County Council unanimously passed a resolution asking that the Government should erect a buoy or perch on certain rocks in Valencia Harbour—namely, to perch a rock known as Lackavallig, and also to place a bell buoy on a sunken rock almost opposite Valencia Island lighthouse, and north-west of Begrish Island; and whether, seeing that the absence of this perch and bell buoy causes danger to life and property in the districts mentioned, he will give a favourable consideration to the request.

MR. PLUNKETT: The resolutions of the county council, to which reference is made, were considered by the Congested Districts Board at their meeting held in April last, when it was decided that the Board could not undertake either of the works mentioned. The Board have been advised that the works could only be carried out by a local lighthouse authority within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts.

ROADS BOAT SLIP, SOUTH KERRY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that inconvenience and hardship is caused to a number of fishermen in the surrounding districts owing to the unfinished state of the Roads boat slip, in South Kerry; and whether, having regard to the fact that a portion of the people have to subsist on the fishing industry, steps will be taken to give the fishermen improved facilities at the Roads boat slip for the safe launching and landing of fishing boats and better security of human life.

MR. PLUNKETT: The question of effecting improvements in the boat slip at Roads is at present under the consideration of the Congested Districts Board.

THEFTS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE IN TRANSIT.

MR. ARCHDALE: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland if his attention has been called to the losses suffered by Irish farmers owing to the pilfering and wholesale robbery of their butter and other produce during its transit to customers in England; and whether the Department can devise some means, either by the appointment of an official to supervise all rates and charges or some other way, by which such losses can be prevented.

MR. PLUNKETT: The attention of the Department has been directed to complaints of the character mentioned in the question. The matter is at present under the consideration of the Department.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1900–1901.

CLASS II.

1. Motion made and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £8,095, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary for Scotland and Subordinate Offices, including a Grant in Aid of the Congested Districts (Scotland) Fund."

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I rise to move a reduction of this Vote in connection with the sum devoted to the Congested Districts Board; and I have put down the notice of reduction in order to indicate that we who represent northern constituencies in Scotland have something like a Scottish grievance in connection with the action of the Congested Districts Board generally. In May last* this Committee sat to consider a proposal to vote a grant in aid to this very Board, and on that occasion I made some comments on the action of that Board which could scarcely be construed as in any degree favourable to it. However, it is right I should point out that there was no Report on the action of the Board in the hands of the members of the Committee at the time the Vote was brought under debate. The Lord Advocate, in his reply, accused me of making irresponsible charges, of speaking in ignorance, and of using wild and rash language. I make no complaint personally with regard to that. So far as I am concerned, I pay no attention to it at all. But there was much more than a mere personal element in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, because, if the charges I made were irresponsible, if I spoke in ignorance, and if I used wild and rash language, it is perfectly obvious that the only inference to be drawn is that there was no foundation for those charges, and that they ought never to have been made. Now, this House has, and, indeed, ought to possess, great power over the public purse, and I cannot help thinking it is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs when you have a Government coming to the House and asking for money before it has produced any Report on the action of the Board by which that money is to be spent. It is obvious, if the Government will not publish Reports before Votes are taken, that it is impossible for Members who are asked to discuss the Vote to be thoroughly possessed of the facts which are in the possession of the Government. I certainly cannot understand why we should not have had the Report before the grant was asked for, seeing that the Lord Advocate had a copy of it in his hand and treated the Committee for about three-quarters of an hour to a lecture based on the very document which had been withheld from the members of the Committee. He said that the charges I made were irresponsible. By that I understood him to mean that they were of no significance, and were not founded on fact. What were the charges I made? In the first place I said that the money granted to the Congested Districts Board had been granted mainly for two purposes; one for the purchase of land to relieve the congested districts of Scotland, and the other for the promotion of migration. I added that the Government had not expended a single sovereign in the purcase of land for the purpose indicated, and neither had they migrated a single crofter. Were these charges irresponsible? Were they true or not? In February last the Lord Advocate said that £1,451 had been actually expended on migration; yet not a single crofter has been migrated, judging from the Report which has recently been placed in our hands. I see a good deal there about the spraying of potatoes, so perhaps the right hon. Gentleman, in speaking of migration, refers to the migration of microbes. I charge this Congested Districts Board, which has been in existence since 1897, and in possession of public funds for the purpose of procuring lands in order to relieve the congested districts, that they have not purchased any land, and have not relieved any congestion in the northern districts. The Lord Advocate cited one specific instance with regard to the Strathnaver holdings, but that scheme appears to have been a total failure, for not a single crofter took advantage of it, and it has practically been abandoned. The words of the Report on this point are—

"From this document [resolutions passed at a meeting at Bettyhill] it will be seen that the condition proposed by us which seemed to cause the greatest difficulty in the way of the success of our scheme, was that which had reference to taking the sheep stock at valuation."

And again—

"It seemed difficult, therefore, in view of the disappointing response, to proceed further with the scheme as proposed, and it appeared as if the insufficiency of the number of suitable applicants would make it necessary for us to decline to purchase this portion of Syre."

I should explain that there were only twelve applicants for eleven of the sixteen holdings, and of these several stated that they would not take any portion of the present stock, although it was offered to them at a price to be fixed by agreement instead of by valuation. The Board continue—

"In these circumstanes the Board regret that they do not feel justified in proceeding with the scheme, and cannot accept the offer which you [i.e., the applicant] has made. They may possibly even be obliged to relinquish the option of purchase of the farm in question, and abandon the attempt to make it available for small holdings, a result which the Board would deeply regret."

I cannot help thinking it was scarcely generous on the part of the Lord Advocate to accuse me of making irresponsible charges, when he at the same moment held in his hand a copy of the Report from which I have just quoted. There has been a meeting of some members of the Congested Districts Board and a number of gentlemen representing the crofters of Sutherlandshire, in which this scheme was carefully gone over, and the very items I have pointed out are amongst those to which strong objection was taken by the crofter representatives. It has been pointed out that three-fourths of the population are not in a position to touch such holdings as were proposed by the Congested Districts Board. It has been shown too—and the Lord Advocate himself should have known it—that to ask the crofters to take over sheep at a Highland valuation was a thing which no shrewd man or no man of common sense, who knew anything about the Highland valuation of sheep, would have anything to do with. There was also a proposition that these unfortunate crofters should take advantage of what was described by the Lord Advocate as being a very handsome condition—they were to pay so much in respect of the shootings over the lands. But the land had been cut up into innumerable small holdings, and if the shootings were to be cut up in the same way and given to a large number of small proprietors what value would have attached to them? Could the Lord Advocate have guaranteed that the value of the shootings would have continued for any length of time? A scheme containing such a condition could not be applicable to small crofters, who have the greatest difficulty in the world in keeping body and soul together. It is simply absurd and preposterous. I say, therefore, that the charges I made were not irresponsible but were well founded, as is borne out in this very Report. I may further point out that the Board actually desired to charge these crofters at the rate of 3s. 10½d. per yard for fencing. Anyone must know that that is too high a figure for such fencing as is put up in these places. I know that when I have had any put up I have had it done at a lower price, and, therefore, when you are dealing with men of small means, or with no means at all, I think one is entitled to claim that they should not be subjected to such exceptional charges. Then I come to the Borve holdings, and I will quote this paragraph from the Report—

"From Mr. Carmichael's report we learned for the first time that it was considered impracticable to cut the farm up into twenty-four distinct lots, and that it was now proposed to mark off twenty-four small blocks of land beside the houses, amounting in all to little more than eighty acres, and that the remainder of the farm should be held and worked in common."

The Board finish up on this point by frankly stating that the only lot which was applied for was taken by the Free Church minister. I have no objection to this, but it is surely reducing the efforts of this Board to an absurdity when you find that the only result of their attempt to reduce the congestion of the crofter districts in the Highlands is an assignment of a holding to a Free Church minister, who certainly cannot be considered to be a crofter. Then the Board started apparently to get feus for fishermen. They got a plot of land of about seven acres near Stornoway. What was the result? The Report tells us that—

"At the expiry of the period fixed in the notice the only applicant was a fisherman from Garrabost, who appeared to be a suitable person for the purpose we had in view, but as he was the only applicant for any one of the twenty-nine feus proposed we had to express to him our regret that it was impossible for us to proceed further with the scheme."

This, the third scheme of this Board, proved to be an absolute futility. Now I come to the Glendale holdings, with reference to which the Commissioners say—

"We entertained the application favourably, and were prepared to accede to it. But meantime it transpired that the proprietor had made other arrangements as to the said lands, and the application was withdrawn."

Then comes the Bay Farm (Skye) scheme, as to which the Commissioners say—

"This scheme includes the formation of certain roads and the erection of a boundary fence. If carried out there is reason to hope that it may be attended with success."

There you have from the Report of the Commissioners themselves the whole account of their endeavours to relieve the congested districts in the north of Scotland by the purchase of land, and I say again, as I said in May, that the main purpose for which this House voted a sum of money and entrusted the expenditure of it to the Commission has practically failed. They have done nothing in the direction it was intended they should go We know from the Lord Advocate that last year they spent over £2,000 in administrative expenses, a sum which, I suppose, goes in large salaries to certain gentlemen or officials connected with the Board. But, so far as the main purposes of the Congested Districts Act are concerned, the work of the Commissioners has been futile, and the charges which I made, and which the Lord Advocate represented to be irresponsible, were charges which have unfortunately only too much substance. They have done something, of course. They have devoted some attention to bee-keeping, and we learn from their Report that they started with three hives, swarms, and outfits, which were sent to a certain man in the Highlands. I gather also that they sent 143 sittings of eggs to various parts, and they have purchased a certain number of bulls, rams, and stallions in order to improve the breed of stock in the Highlands. I do not deny that all this is very desirable, but it was not the main object for which this money was voted by the House of Commons. Certain work has been done, or is promised to be done, in regard to piers and roads. No doubt that, too, is desirable, especially if the piers are put in places which are suitable; but from my experience in connection with the neighbourhood, while the Orkney Commissioners have erected piers at great expense in places where there is no very considerable traffic, they have absolutely refused to consider the question of erecting a pier at St. Margaret's Hope, where mail steamers call, and where one is very desirable indeed. Bearing in mind all the facts I have stated, I submit that this Committee is entitled to use its discretion as to continuing to vote money for a Board which does not devote it to the real purpose for which it was originally granted, however desirable may be the objects to which it is actually applied. There is another matter with which I must deal before I sit down. In the debate in 1899, the Lord Advocate took credit for a scheme which had been in embryo. It was a scheme of the Secretary for Scotland to devote a considerable sum of money for a specific purpose. That purpose was technical education, and the Lord Advocate, in the course of his speech, said he was glad to think that when hon. Members had in their hands copies of this Report which I now have in my hand they would perceive that the responsibility for the failure of that measure to pass had been put on the right shoulders—namely, the shoulders of myself and the hon. friends who sit beside me. I do not think, if I may be allowed to say so, it is proper to use a Government Report as a means for making an attack on any of the hon. Members of this House, but it is still worse when that attack is made by a member of the Government who has a Report in his hand which is not in the hands of the Members he is attacking. While seeking to say the least offensive thing I can, I must say that I never heard a smaller-minded thing said in this House than was said by the Lord Advocate when he said he was glad to think that the responsibility for that failure would be put on the right shoulders—meaning that this Report would go down to the constituencies, and that the constituencies would see who their friends were, I presume. There was an informal meeting held in the Lord Advocate's room last year, by invitation of the Secretary for Scotland, to consider this very scheme, and I should have thought myself that, being an informal meeting, no one would venture to mention it in this House. But it has been mentioned, and I feel perfectly free to say anything I know on the subject. You see in the Report that the Board endeavour to throw the responsibility for the "blocking" of the Bill on the Members for Northern constituencies.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The hon. Member will pardon me. What I said about the "blocking" of the Bill surely referred to a public matter.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I accept what the Lord Advocate says. At the same time I am sure hon. Members sitting on this side will remember that the matter was specifically referred to, and also the fact that there had been a meeting.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: In my opinion it is very much to be deprecated that you should make allusions to what was done at a private meeting. I certainly should have transgressed had I made allusion to that. Personally I think it is a rule that ought not to be transgressed. There is not a word in my speech about that matter.

MR. HEDDERWICK: My recollection of the debate does not exactly tally with the statement the Lord Advocate has just made, but I will accept the statement. It is quite possible that my memory may be wrong and his accurate. I shall not make any further reference to what took place at the meeting.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I have got Hansard before me.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I shall pass from that at once, but I think I am entitled to say this—and I do not think the Lord Advocate will dispute it for a moment — certainly for one I really approved of the scheme so far as I knew it, but I did not approve of the scheme until I had ascertained that there were available funds in the hands of the Districts Board Commissioners—a balance of money which might be applied to some other purpose which the Secretary for Scotland might think desirable and in the interest of the crofters in the Highlands. The Report itself fortunately contains a copy of the Bill which was proposed by the Secretary for Scotland, and which was not passed. You will find that that Bill is in the most general terms possible. There is not a word about technical education in the whole Bill. I think it is simply to the effect that power should be given to the Secretary for Scotland to utilise the money for any purpose which he might think proper. I confess that my hon. friends who took the view they did take, and who refused to allow that Bill to proceed, may very well be justified, because no one could foresee what the purposes were in the mind of the Secretary for Scotland to which he intended to devote this money if the power had been given to him to do so. When you consider the large sums of money which the Commissioners have had in their hands so long, and which have not been applied to the purposes for which they were voted by the House, I confess my hon. colleagues will have an admirable case before the constituencies if it should be sought by the Lord Advocate to use this sentence which occurs in the Blue-book and which is an endeavour, in point of fact, to throw the responsibility on their shoulders for the failure. I do not know whether it is a failure or not, because the scheme never passed into being; and unless it was for technical education it is impossible for me to say what the purpose was. I deprecate the insertion in Reports issued as Government Reports of party attacks, and the more especially is that form of political warfare to be deprecated when those attacks are made by a Member of the House in the honourable position of Lord Advocate, who is himself the only person who has a copy of the Report he is reading in his hand. One might say a great deal more on this subject, but I feel myself that enough has been said. I wish to point out to members of the Committee that, in point of fact, while the administrative expenses have been going on in connection with this Congested Districts Board, there has been no expenditure by the Board upon the purposes for which the money was voted by the House of Commons, although now three years or more have elapsed since the money was voted. Having regard to the fact that this Report, as I said before, is a futility as far as any practical performance is concerned, I beg to move a reduction of the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item E (Congested Districts Board) be reduced by £500."—(Mr. Hedderwick.)

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said his hon. friend felt very strongly the observations made respecting him and his colleagues on that side of the House in connection with this matter. He was not going to refer to the interview which Members of the House had with the Secretary for Scotland. He considered that interview private, and had kept his mouth closed. The Lord Advocate would not deny what he stated to the House the last time the matter was discussed. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he was one of those who blocked the Bill. That statement was absolutely false and unfounded. The Lord Advocate had no right, in the position he occupied, to make statements which were inaccurate and without any foundation with regard to the attitude and conduct of Members. The Lord Advocate at that time entrenched himself behind a Report of which Members of the House had no knowledge whatever. It had not been issued. He thought that was a most unfair advantage to take of Members. In the Report they found on page 7—

"It was obviously inexpedient for us to enter upon any enterprise which we were not quite sure we should have the right to carry through in all its developments, and we were advised that the clauses of the Act did not cover certain of the objects which were pressed upon us by those who knew the necessities of the Highlands very thoroughly. Early in 1899 we urged that a short Bill should be prepared giving us power to apply a portion of our funds for purposes other than those set forth in the Act of 1897, when we were satisfied that the expenditure would be for the benefit of the inhabitants of the congested districts. A copy of this Bill will be found in the appendix. It was introduced in the House of Lords by the Secretary for Scotland and passed through the various stages there; but as it was opposed and 'blocked' by some of the Members for the constituencies which would in our opinion have most benefited by its provisions, it had, in the state of public business, to be withdrawn at the end of July, 1899."

The constituency he represented was the constituency that would receive the greatest benefit from any such scheme as this, and he was particularly careful to impress this on the Lord Advocate. He was careful to avoid interfering in any way with the progress of the Bill. He was anxious that it should become law, and that there should be in Stornoway, in the island of Lewis, a scheme carried out for the purpose of giving technical instruction. He was particularly careful not to do anything to hinder or hamper the Bill, and yet the Lord Advocate months afterwards got up in his place and made a charge against hon. Members with respect to the withdrawal of the measure. The statement was false and contemptible.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: What I did say—I am reading now from Hansard, which was revised by myself at the time; and as far as my recollection goes I know of no reason to question the accuracy of the report—what I said was—

"Hon. Members know that the Bill was blocked by hon. Members opposite belonging to those very portions of the country whose constituents would have been benefited, and the responsibility for that failure I am very glad to put upon their shoulders."

The Member for Wick then said that he had not blocked the Bill, and the Member for Ross-shire said he had not blocked the Bill, and I accepted the disclaimer, but said that the hon. Member had been one of those who prevented it passing.

*MR. WEIR again denied that he had done anything to hinder or hamper the progress of the Bill, and it was most ungenerous to allege that Members of the House blocked the measure. Probably it was thought that such a statement might catch votes. If it did catch a stray vote or two it was a most contemptible mode of securing them. With regard to the migration of crofters, he had asked several questions during the session, but had always been told to wait until the Report was published. On the 30th March he asked the Lord Advocate how many crofters had been migrated with the assistance of the Congested Districts Board, and the reply was that none had actually been migrated. And yet that was the very object for which the Act of Parliament was passed! There was an expenditure during the year of £8,000, of which £2,114 12s. 4d. went in administrative charges. The charges had diminished slightly since, but certainly it was not a satisfactory way to conduct the business to have such excessive charges for administration. If the directors of any commercial enterprise tolerated any such expenses, they would be cleared out very quickly, but because this was a Government Department, they were required to submit to them. The Committee had every right to object to this state of things, and he trusted the Amendment would be pressed to a division, as that was the only way in which a protest could be lodged against the conduct of the Board. There were a few matters in the Report to which he desired to refer. On page 7 there was this paragraph—

"A shipowner who is impressed with this difficulty offered us the free use of a ship for six months to try an experiment he suggested. This ship had previously been used as a tender to a training ship, and had every requisite on board for the purpose suggested. The proposal was that there should be a vessel with accommodation for about fifty boys, where for three months or the like period each lad should receive rudimentary instruction in sea life and its usages before being drafted into the regular training ship."

There was no further information, and he should like to know whether that offer had been accepted, and if it had not, whether the Admiralty had been approached with a view to getting a training ship at Stornoway. Highland boys would not go to the lowlands of Scotland to these training ships. Then came the question of holdings, migration, and fishermen's dwellings. Reference had been made to some land in the Island of Lewis, for which it was arranged the tenants should pay £1 5s. per quarter-acre. It was monstrous that they should be expected to pay £5 per acre. Besides, what could be done with quarter-acre plots? If only, instead of coming to Parliament and talking on subjects they knew nothing about, the Lord Advocate, or the Secretary for Scotland, or some other responsible person, would visit these islands and find out how the people lived, they would have more sympathy for Highland crofters than they now evidenced. There were twenty-six of these plots, but he was not surprised to find there was only one applicant. It was impossible for people to enter into such arrangements as were imposed; they would only saddle themselves with burdens they could not bear. Statements were often made in the House that the Highlanders had the means but would not pay. That was not true. The Highland crofters were honest and industrious, and they were willing and anxious to pay 20s. in the £, and not 5s. or 10s., as the House was frequently led to believe. What were the Board going to do in the matter? Were they going to say there was no possible chance of getting any land in the Island of Lewis? Were they going to throw up the sponge and say they had exhausted every means for securing land? When the Bill was passing through the House he had urged there would be great difficulty in securing land, because there was no clause providing for compulsory acquisition. What was the Board going to do about the waste land in the Island of Lewis? Was it impossible to make any better arrangements with the landlord? The Committee were entitled to some information on this subject. Then there was a letter sent from the Landward Committee, Stornoway, as to conditions of feu of fishermen's dwellings. Mr. Macfarlane, clerk of the Stornoway Parish Council, acting on behalf of the people, wrote to the Congested Districts Board asking them for information as follows—

"'Each house to be used as a dwelling house for one family and for no other purpose.' Please say does this mean that the feuar will be prevented from keeping a lodger or lodgers? 'Keeping a shop or carrying on a trade on the feu.' Does this rule prevent the feuar from selling even bread or groceries in any part of his house? Or if the feuar fisherman should happen to be a tradesman, is he prohibited from working at his trade, should he be unable to follow the fishing? Is the feuar's wife or other female member of the family prohibited from conducting, say, a small dressmaking or millinery business?"

We would expect the Congested Districts Board to be able to give a direct and straight answer to such questions; but what was their reply? On the 27th December, 1899, they said—

"For trading or business purposes the rate of feu duty would be substantially higher."

The selling of a few sweets or loaves of bread would make it a trading or business place, and the feu duty would be substantially higher. That was a specimen of sympathy with the people! According to paragraph 2—

"If the house remains essentially a dwelling-house the Board do not think that the feuar's wife would be prohibited from carrying on such an occupation as dressmaking, nor do they think the feuar himself, while pursuing his occupation as a fisherman, would be prevented, in his spare time, from engaging in such mechanical or other industry as can be carried on in a dwelling-house."

Was it likely any crofter would take a feu on such a statement as that? The crofter wanted to know absolutely whether or not his wife or daughter would be permitted to carry on a dressmaking business, but the reply of Mr. R. Macgregor, the secretary to the Board, was that the Board "did not think" she would be prohibited from doing so. Then Mr. De Moleyns was sent up for the purpose of explaining to or teaching the people the potato-spraying process. That gentleman issued a report on the 12th August, 1899, as to the experiments, and he did not afterwards go near the places nor send any competent person until 21st October, when, upon arriving at Stornoway and visiting the various places in the island, he found all the potato lifting had been done. Surely instructions should have been issued by the secretary to the Board. This was how the money of the Congested Districts Board was squandered. He wished to know something about the construction of the Carloway Road. They had carried on the work from two ends, and they had got stuck in a bog. If they drove along that road from Stornoway or Carloway, they would get to that bog, and no further. Was that a satisfactory condition of things? Was the right hon. Gentleman aware that £15,000 was granted by the Conservative Government in 1891 for that road? Was it for the purpose of catching votes in the 1892 election? He did not mind the Government getting votes, but they should not get them under false pretences. It was the duty of the Government engineer to see that proper plans were prepared, not to exceed £15,000, and if the road was likely to take £25,000 or £30,000, they had no business to start it. That was how matters were managed for Scotland. The receipts of the Congested Districts Board amounted to £78,129 6s. 10d., and they had a balance in hand of £60,134 6s. 8d. There were many other items about which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would furnish them with the fullest information. The balance-sheet showed a balance in hand on the 1st of April, 1899, of £40,804. There was a sum of £15,000 from the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account, and £20,000 was the annual sum voted by Parliament in aid of the fund. Was that sum of money lying at the Bank of Scotland at interest? The miscellaneous receipts from agriculture were £1,403, and land and migration repayments of loans and interest £29 9s. 6d. As small loans in connection with land and migration the crofters had £1,310, and they had paid back their first instalments, which was very satisfactory indeed, and he hoped they should hear no more about crofters not paying their honest and just debts. On the other side of the account they found the administrative expenses amounting to £1,524.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Captain SINCLAIR, Forfarshire). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. WEIR (continuing) said the Report disclosed a most unsatisfactory method of keeping the accounts. What they wanted, what they were entitled to, and what he should continue to press for was a detailed statement in the Estimates of the amounts expended under the various sub-sections. They were entitled to have the respective amounts expended under those headings. The Congested Districts Board had as secretary a man who was a clerk in the Exchequer Office in Edinburgh, and he received £650 a year for his services as chief clerk in that office. The Secretary for Scotland had appointed him to do the secretarial work of the Congested Districts Board of Scotland, and he took out of the Congested Districts Board's funds £150 a year. The Board also took another £150 a year from the fund for the purpose of paying a man to do the work which this clerk was not able to do in the Exchequer Department. Was that a satisfactory method of conducting business? They took £300 a year for the purpose of paying a secretary, and the same man had to attend to his duties at the Exchequer Office. No wonder he was not acquainted with all the facts. Had it never entered the minds of the members of the Congested Districts Board that it would be very much better to give this sum of £300 to one man, who could give his whole time to the work of the Board? There were plenty of competent men to be found in Edinburgh for £300 a year, which was the sum now paid for doing the work badly. He hoped the Board would give this point consideration. He wished also to express his regret at the callous indifference of the Board to carry out the provisions of the Act of Parliament for the purpose of removing crofters from the congested districts. Several years ago the right hon. Gentleman said the scheme was well in hand, but why did the Board not carry it out? Not a single crofter had been migrated. This was certainly not in accordance with the promise of the Secretary for Scotland. He hoped the matter would receive the attention of the Government.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I should like to say two or three words upon this Vote. A few weeks ago, when we had this question before us, the Lord Advocate read an extract from the Report which we have now got in our hands. We are much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for giving us the opportunity, now that we are in possession of that Report, to discuss the subject with greater knowledge. One cannot help observing that there appears to be a useless expenditure of money under this Vote. It is not very easy to inquire into the origin of this expenditure during the past year, which has been transferred from one account to another without going back to the year 1891. The object of this expenditure was mainly for the construction of piers, roads, and public works in the Highlands. That remained as a Vote upon our Estimates till a couple of years ago. During the time that the Liberal Government was in office they made certain arrangements which they had not time to carry out, and they were naturally pressed as to what they would do in regard to them. They were not able to propose anything directly in the way of carrying out that Report, and as a kind of solatium they brought forward the Congested Districts Board Bill of 1897, which is the Act under which this Board exercises its powers at the present moment. The Board got very wide powers under that Act, although not wide enough for the desires of the present Secretary for Scotland, and they have had a large sum of money voted by Parliament every year since that time. Although in this Estimate we are only voting £20,000, there is an additional sum of £15,000 per annum paid out of the Local Taxation Fund, so that its income out of the public exchequer amounts to no less than £35,000 per annum. My hon. friend has already called attention to the fact that the Report we hold in our hands gives a statement of accounts down to the 31st of March in the present year, and gives us information down to the end of the last financial year. We find that they had in hand a balance of £60,000, while their expenditure during that year amounted to no more than £20,000. I think the year before it was something less than that amount. The Board are at the present moment quite unable to spend anything like the money that is voted to them by Parliament for the purposes for which they were created. As the Committee knows, this sum is not returned in the Exchequer balance, but is kept by the Congested Districts Board and allowed to accumulate in their hands, so that we find that the Secretary for Scotland on the 31st of March last had a balance of £60,000 in his hands, and he asks for £35,000 more this year to spend under the provisions of this Act of Parliament. Is it worth while that we should go on paying what is really the interest upon a million of money which is substantially in the hands of the Secretary for Scotland alone, to spend practically in almost any way he chooses in certain limited districts and counties in Scotland? I think the policy which permits such an expenditure of public money by the Secretary for Scotland is very questionable indeed, and it becomes still more questionable when we hear of the great want of success, to put it very mildly, of the effort which this Board has made to spend the money for the purposes provided for under the Act of 1897. I am not going into the details of this Report nor into the general purposes for which the money could be spent. My hon. friend the Member for Wick has alluded to the question of migration, and he has said very truly that in this respect the efforts of the Board to spend money in new settlements have proved practically futile. I think that view is entirely borne out by the Report itself. If we go into the other subjects and consider the purposes for which this money has been spent we find the same result; in fact, I think it would require a humorist to deal with this Report, and that is not one of the characteristics of Scotch Members, and I am sure it is not one of my characteristics. I must decline even an effort to deal adequately with the transactions of a body supplying bulls and stallions, which are described in almost equally humorous language upon some of the pages of the Report, and they have met with an extraordinary want of success in carrying out their schemes of advancing seed potatoes. I say that it is humorous reading, but it is also a very serious matter, for it is a very great waste of public money to go on year after year voting this sum of £20,000 for purposes for which this Board, with all the desire in the world to spend the money, could not contrive a way of doing so. I should like to say a word as to the constitution of the Board as a spending authority. I say that it is really not a Board at all, for it is really the Secretary for Scotland, and he alone, who has all the power upon this Board. If anyone will take the trouble to look at the Act of Parliament he will see that the Secretary for Scotland makes all the rules, to begin with, to regulate the proceedings and the meetings of the Board. He has passed the Act of Parliament, and he names all the unofficial members on the Board, who are in a minority. He appoints a secretary, and fixes his salary. We have no record of the meetings of this Board, and it seems physically impossible to hold many meetings, because the majority of the members hold official positions in various parts of Scotland. The Secretary for Scotland has distinct control over one branch of the expenditure; he is himself chairman of the Board, and he reports to the Secretary for Scotland, so that he draws up the Report of this Board, presents it to himself, and then to this House. It is clear to anyone who looks into the matter that substantially we are voting every year a sum of £35,000 for the Secretary for Scotland to spend as he likes, and I do not think that is a proper expenditure of public money. I wish to add my word of protest against this expenditure. I do not think that such a remark should have been made in a Report laid before Parliament, particularly in a Report signed by a Member of the other House. Here is what appears on page 7 of that Report. A Bill

> "was introduced in the House of Lords by the Secretary for Scotland to extend the powers of the Congested Districts Board, and passed through the various stages there; but as it was opposed and 'blocked' by some of the Members for the constituencies which would, in our opinion, have most benefited by its provisions, it had, in the state of public business, to be withdrawn at the end of July, 1899."

I do not think such an observation should have appeared in any Parliamentary Paper. I do not think that it lies in the mouth of a Minister of the Crown to complain in a public document of the action of Members of this House in the discharge of their duty to their constituents, in full liberty and on their own responsibility. So far as my recollection goes I do not believe that any effort was made in this House last year to pass the Bill through the House of Commons. It never was put down to public discussion at a time when it could possibly come on. I go further and ask, if this Bill is of such great importance, if it was so absolutely necessary, in the opinion of the Congested Districts Board, that their powers should be enlarged, why was it not introduced this session? We have heard nothing of it since July, 1899, and I believe that unless we had been reminded of it by the paragraph in the Report of the Congested Districts Board the existence of the Bill would have passed entirely out of the memory of the Scottish Members. I am prepared to move the reduction of the Vote by £10,000, because I believe it is a waste of money. The Congested Districts Board are not able to spend the whole of it during the currency of the financial year. Moreover, I consider that it is demoralising to the people amongst whom it is spent. Trying to stimulate industries in districts of the country where such industries are totally unsuitable leads to extravagance, and does little indeed to encourage the independence of the people or to develop a better system.

DR. CLARK (Caithness-shire) said they had not the report of the Congested Districts Board in hand when the Scotch Estimates were last before the Committee. They, however, had now got it, and they knew what that Board had done during the past year. He, for one, was not astonished that nothing had been done. He never expected that much would be done, because the Board had no powers under the Act to compel Scotch landlords to assist in giving land on which to settle crofters. Out of £35,000, which was voted by Parliament last year, the Board had only spent £1,500 on the migration of crofters. The emigration to Canada had proved a failure, and therefore it was proposed that that money should be spent in migration; but the Board had spent more in management than in migration. Moreover, in the one case where they had spent money, instead of placing the migrated crofters under the Crofters Act, which they ought to have done, they had planted them as leaseholders who did not enjoy the benefits of the Crofters Act, and thus the crofters had ceased to be crofters. That was a very shameful thing for the Board to do. Two schemes had been brought before the crofters—one in Sutherlandshire and the other near Stornoway. The price asked for the Sutherlandshire land was simply preposterous. Why, land was offered within fifty miles of London at a quarter of the price asked for the poor land in Sutherlandshire. In fact, the crofters would be better off by coming to Bedfordshire and Cambridgeshire, because they could get land there at half the price asked in Sutherlandshire. He was astonished at the Congested Districts Board bringing before the crofters of Stornoway a feuing scheme. The maximum size of the holding was a quarter of an acre. Of course, the thing was a farce and a dead failure. He expected that from the very beginning, and therefore was not disappointed. Until the Board got compulsory powers to acquire land no good would be done. He was inclined to vote for this grant of money ceasing altogether, because he did not see why it should be piled up and not spent for any useful purpose. He was not sure that it was not more baneful than stimulating at the present time. If the Board went to work on proper lines, some good might be done in Argyllshire and other parts of the west of Scotland.

*Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The hon. Member for Wick Burghs seems to complain bitterly of the language I used in a former debate. What I sought to contradict was the statement, which the hon. Member repeated to-day, that the scheme of the Congested Districts Board for the Strathnaver holdings was a preposterous one. One of his reasons for saying that the scheme was preposterous was that the sheep were to be taken over at a valuation; but the hon. Member forgot for the moment that although that condition was originally made, it was withdrawn by a qualifying notice issued on 8th January, and the scheme, as it was submitted, did not contain that provision in it. The letters of gentlemen who lived in the neighbourhood —one a clergyman and the other the convener of the county council—characterised the scheme as it then stood as a scheme which was a very fair and generous one. Therefore the hon. Member will find it was a humble protest on my part against applying anything like the epithet "preposterous" to this scheme. Regarding the statements of the hon. Member in which he said the Board were persons who had other things to do and were not in earnest, I do not think the word "irresponsible" was an unparliamentary epithet. The members were, as I pointed out, chosen because they were persons engaged in other avocations, in order to get, so far as we could, those who, in Scotland, could bring the maximum of experience to deal with this difficult subject. I do not consider it was a fair description of the efforts of these gentlemen who constituted this Board to say they were not in earnest. Another subject of grievance with the hon. Member was that the Report of the Congested Districts Board was in my hands and not in those of the Scotch Members. I explained on a former occasion that I was not responsible for fixing the particular date on which the Vote was to be brought forward. That had been arranged by the Leader of the House, who, as hon. Members know, is always exceedingly anxious to take hon. Members opposite along with him. The usual notice was given that the Scotch Estimates would be taken on that day, and no suggestion was made through the ordinary channels of communication that the Vote should not be taken then. So far I do not see what I could have done otherwise in the matter. Personally I think it is a great deal more fitting and convenient that the Vote should be taken after the Report is out, and certainly if I am spared to be in the same place in the year to come we will not have discussion without the Report. But, at any rate, I have shown my view of the matter by putting this Vote down for discussion to-day. I can scarcely be held blameworthy when to a certain extent I quoted from the Report. The hon. Gentleman said that I read from the Report for three quarters of an hour; but, as a matter of fact, I only read two sentences of ten lines long each. It is natural that I should have justified the action of the Board by telling the Committee, as I did, precisely what the Board had been doing. I do not propose to go through, as I did on a former occasion, the detailed history of what the Congested Districts Board have been doing during the last year. I am content to let the Scottish people judge for themselves. On a perusal of the Report of the Board, which speaks for itself, it could not be said that the Board have been doing nothing, and have been a failure, because they have not been to any extent successful in migrating crofters. I am quite aware that this is a question which bulks very largely in the minds of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, who thought it was the one opportunity for usefulness above all others for the Congested Districts Board. They said that because, as a matter of fact, the Board have not been to any great extent successful in their migration schemes, therefore the Board are at fault. I deprecate that position altogether. So far as the policy of the Board is concerned, they do not propose to migrate crofters in any eleemosynary sense. They do not propose to do more than help those who are in the position to help themselves. The hon. Member spoke a good deal about the Strathnaver case; but there have been successful operations in other cases, although the holdings have been small, no doubt. But the Strathnaver case cannot even now be said to be a failure, because the whole matter is even now open, and, as a matter of fact, efforts are being made to induce crofters to settle there. Hon. Members must recollect that for any success in the direction of migration we must necessarily have time. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of the people in the West Highlands, but anybody who knew them must be aware that they would be always glad to accept such benefits as Providence or anyone else may put before them, and that there will always be a strong desire to get a thing for nothing rather than pay anything for it. I have little doubt myself that, until it is seen that the settled policy of the Board is not simply to give the land away, but to help those who will help themselves, the people will hang back for better terms. The Board has only been in existence for two years, which is a very short time for experiments of an undoubtedly difficult character to get into such a position as to have a practical chance of success. Although I should be very far from saying that there is anything to entitle one to hold out a sanguine hope of assured success, I think this is a matter in which the House may be fairly asked to exercise to a certain extent the virtue of a little patience. What I do claim for the Congested Districts Board, and what a perusal of the Report will show to any fair-minded person, is that they had really been assiduous in this matter, and have tried their best and are still trying their best. Hon. Members have commented somewhat severely on the statement in the Report as to the proceedings on last year's Bill. I confess I cannot see anything wrong in that statement, or that it bears anything, so far as I understand it, of the nature of what may be called a party character. What was said was that the Bill was opposed and "blocked" by some Members whose constituencies, in the opinion of the Board, would have been most benefited by its provisions. Here is what I myself said when the Scotch Estimates were last before the Committee—

"With the view to procuring that power"

—which the Board had not got—

"my noble friend introduced last year a Bill, which passed all its stages in the House of Lords, which would have allowed a sum of money to be used in this direction. Hon. Members know that that Bill was blocked by hon. Members opposite belonging to those very portions of the country whose constituencies would have been benefited, and the responsibility for that failure I am very glad to put on their shoulders."

I cannot see that there is anything unparliamentary in that. Of course I was glad to say, in my speech, that I was able to put the saddle on the right horse; but is there any reason why I should not say so? Certainly that class of statement has been made over and over again in Parliament. The hon. Member for the Wick Burghs is very wrong in putting the cap on himself. I never alluded to the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs as obstructing the Bill in any way. On the contrary, I think the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs did his best to help the Government to pass the Bill and get it brought forward. The hon. Member for Ross-shire now is in rather a difficult position. The hon. Member now states that he did not block the Bill, and I accepted the statement at once, and willingly withdraw what I formerly said about the hon. Member. I was under the impression that the hon. Member for Ross-shire was one of those who "blocked" it and would not allow the Bill to pass. The Bill, as a matter of fact, was blocked, and on the 24th July there were five notices on the Paper "that it be read a second time this day three months." These five notices were all given by Members on the opposite benches, two of them representing crofter constituencies. I think that is ample justification of my statement that the Bill was absolutely blocked.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): That is not "blocking."

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: It was "blocked" in the sense I used the word "blocking," and in the sense used by every newspaper in the country. If the hon. Member has a peculiar meaning for the word "blocking," he might perhaps explain it to the Committee. "Blocking" means putting down a notice "that the Bill be read a second time this day three months." The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lanarkshire, who enjoys a position of great responsibility on the other side of the House, was consulted by me as to whether the Bill would be allowed to pass.

MR. CALDWELL: I said that it would not be allowed to go through without discussion.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: That is the reason why the Bill was withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that at that period of the session the Bill could not be passed if it was to be opposed. The Bill was introduced on the understanding that it should be passed without discussion, though I do not think that there was any promise given. That really ends what, after all, is not a very important incident. I would not have said so much about it had it not been that it bulked so largely in the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite this afternoon. I come now to one or two small points of detail which were put by the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty. He asked, first of all, about the offer of a tender to the training ship mentioned in page 7 of the Report. But that offer could not be accepted, because the Congested Districts Board believed they would not be allowed to spend the money voted by Parliament in that class of expenditure. That is just one of the points which the Bill introduced last year was wanted to meet. Then the hon. Member referred to the experiments made in potato spraying by Mr. W. T. de Moleyns, of the Irish Congested Districts Board, in Lewis, and complained that that gentleman went back to Lewis a second time. Of course the gentleman who had conducted them wanted naturally to see the result of that series of experiments. On arriving at Stornoway, he found that the potatoes were spread about. I think it would be a matter of curiosity to see what the potatoes were like. The hon. Member asks, "Where was the secretary of the Congested District Board?" Does he really expect that the Congested Districts Board are to group en masse to see the potatoes? What does the hon. Member mean by asking, "Where was the secretary of the Congested Districts Board?"

*MR. WEIR: It is the secretary's business to be in touch with the owners of these potatoes, and to ascertain from them the information that may be required. I think the secretary is not in touch with them. I should not be so insane as to expect all the Commissioners to go up there. I say there is a want of business management.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I think the fact that it is an out-of-the-way district is a sufficient explanation of his not being at that particular place, and really it was only thought of in order to find out the result of an experiment. The next observation was about roads. I think he overlooked what the Report says on page 77. He will find from that statement that they did see about roads. He spoke also about bees and poultry. There is no more to be said on these matters than is said in the Report, where they are fully dealt with. It is not altogether an easy matter to take up these two branches in a district. He ended his remarks with an attack upon the secretary, in which he said that the secretary's work was not properly performed. That is not at all the opinion of the Board, and it seems to me a little inconsistent with what the hon. Gentleman has stated. At one time he spoke of the great expense of the officials, and in that connection he referred to the fact that the partial time of the secretary is taken instead of his whole time. As a matter of fact, it is impossible that the work could be done more cheaply, and I am informed by the members of the Congested Districts Board that they consider the secretary has done his work exceedingly well. I pass now to the remarks of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, which really were upon quite a different platform from those of the hon. Member for Ross. His complaint is that there is great useless expenditure of money under this Vote. Now, I rather think that what he means by that is that there is a useless amount of money voted under this Vote. He does not mean, I think, that too much money is spent. He means really that he does not think the Board are able to spend the money that they get. Of course, a great deal of his speech was taken up with criticisms of the position of the Secretary for Scotland upon this Board. Well, I quite agree that the Secretary for Scotland is entirely responsible for the policy of this Board, but I do not think that the criticism upon that head is really appropriate to the present, or, indeed, for any other occasion, on the Estimates. That was proper criticism to be made at the time the Bill became an Act. It is all very well to speak in that way now, and that is very often the position of a Government Department, as, for example, the Education Department. The Secretary for Scotland, along, no doubt, with the Duke of Devonshire, is upon that Board, and discusses the policy of the Education Department, and I am not aware that anybody thinks that an undesirable arrangement. I would remind the hon. Member that one of the last legislative achievements of the Government to which he belonged was to do away—and mightily they boasted of it—with the old system of having Boards independent of the control of Parliament. Accordingly, they did away with the Board of Supervision, which had no Parliamentary Minister connected with it, and they constituted the Local Government Board, with the Secretary for Scotland as its Parliamentary head. He is the president. It has a different name, but it is the same thing. He has got exactly the same Board. The Local Government Board have to do what the Secretary for Scotland tells them, and the Secretary for Scotland is amenable to the criticism of this House, just in the same way as any other Minister in any other Department. That is all I can say at the moment on that matter, for this is not the time to defend the arrangement, as it is entirely consistent with the Act of Parliament. In dealing with the question of expenditure the hon. Member referred to the change from the old Highlands and Islands Vote to another Vote. I would remind him that, although the Highlands and Islands Vote was an annual Vote, it owed its origin to a particular province of the Treasury to spend a certain capital sum on the Highlands and Islands, so that really, I think, there was, so to speak, a fresh departure when this Board was started. I want to deal with the question of how the money is spent. I do not know really whether the hon. Member goes the whole length of the hon. Member for Caithness in saying that there ought not to be money given to the Highlands at all. He must either do that or say, "Yes, money ought to be given to the Highlands, but you are not spending it in the proper way." ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members say "Hear, hear," but, as I understood, the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire scarcely associated himself with those remarks. He rather seemed to point out that the money was not only not spent, but not spendable. If that is his view, I do not think it is a view which commends itself to many of the Members who sit around him. I think that ends everything that was said in the debate except what was said by the hon. Member for Caithness. He said he thought this Congested Districts Board had been a failure because it had not compulsory powers in regard to land. I cannot help thinking that the real difficulty has not been the getting of land at all. The Board were quite able to get land, but the real difficulty was the getting of persons, even with all their assistance, who were in a position to give a fair guarantee that they would cultivate that land with a proper prospect of success.

It is all very well for the hon. Member to say that the price of these holdings in the Lews, on Matheson's estate, is far too great. That price, as it happens, is not fixed by the Congested Districts Board at all. It was fixed by the Court of Session, and the lowest price at which land might be got on that estate.

DR. CLARK: Pardon me; I was not referring to that matter.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I do not think I need pursue that point, seeing that he was referring to another case. It does not seem to me that the system broke down because the price was large. The hon. Member said also that the Congested Districts Board ought to have placed the crofters under the Crofters Act. That is an impossibility. You cannot place them under the Crofters Act. Really we come back to where we started. The Congested Districts Board have certainly done nothing in the direction of conferring eleemosynary benefits on the crofters, and in that way pauperising them; but, on the other hand, if you are prepared to consider the question whether there has been a patient endeavour to do the best for the people, who, after all, in many cases are ignorant, and to promote schemes of utility upon a sound economic basis, then I think that anyone who reads the report with a fair mind will see that the Board have done their best.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): In his earlier remarks the right hon. Gentleman took considerable exception to the adjective "preposterous" which an hon. friend behind me has used. I am rather disposed to take up the discredited word "preposterous," and to say that the conclusion I have come to is that this is not only a preposterous Report, but that the Congested Districts Board itself may be worthy of having that adjective applied to it. The right hon. Gentleman maintained that there was no ground for the criticisms passed on one passage in the Report, where the conduct of Members in the House is animadverted upon, where it is said that a most useful and beneficent Bill promoted by the Congested Districts Board had failed to become law because it was "blocked" by some of the Members for the constituencies which would now have been most benefited by its provisions. What are we to understand by this word "blocked"? Let us remember that originally, a good many years ago, it had a technical meaning; anyone could block a Bill to prevent it being considered after a certain hour; but that is a thing of the past. What we now mean by blocking a Bill I do not exactly know. There is no technical meaning. In this case what Members undoubtedly did in this House was to put down the usual notice of opposition to the Bill, with a view of obtaining further information and further consideration on the subject, a thing which is done every day. But the question does not turn upon whether that was a right or a wrong thing for hon. Members to do. The point is that a public official in a public document actually alleges that the reason why something has not been done by his Department or Board is, as he thinks, the flagitious conduct of Members of the House of Commons. I think that is indecency. It would have been indecent if the Board had said that they would have introduced the Bill, but Her Majesty's Government did not approve of it, and if they had thus put the blame on the Government; but it is doubly indecent to put it upon Members of Parliament in the discharge of their duty, who are perfectly entitled to put down notice of opposition to any Bill without being held up in this way by a high public official. What was the reason that these notices were put down? Let the Committee observe that this Bill was a very singular Bill. It was drawn in the vaguest possible terms. It was a Bill of only two clauses. It sought for powers for the Congested Districts Board of Scotland to apply a portion of the fund at their disposal, not exceeding one-fifth thereof, "in further providing for the practical instruction of, or for such other purposes as may appear to be of benefit to, the inhabitants of the said districts." What was felt by a great many members was that this fund was created, and the Board established, mainly for the purpose of improving the position of crofters by extending their holdings, or by migrating them from one place to another. The Board have practically done nothing in that way, but they have nibbled away at little schemes of alleged beneficence, and I dare say they are very philanthropic and nice little schemes in their way. But they have been nibbling away at that kind of thing and have left unspent a large portion of the money at their disposal, and then they come to Parliament and say, "Please give us some further little schemes to spend this money on," some further means of evading the main purposes for which Parliament gave the money, and for which they exist. That was the view taken by Members, and they said, "If you want to instruct the unfortunate inhabitants of these districts in some of the things they would be better of being instructed in, get more money from Parliament, but leave to its original destination the money which was given for other purposes." It was for that reason, and because hon. Members wished for more information, that they are gibbeted in an official Report by the Secretary for Scotland. I now come to the question of the Board. I do not know whether the Board is, as a witness said of the Board of Admiralty, useful as a screen, but I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that there was at one time within my Parliamentary experience very considerable jealousy in regard to the system of Boards which then largely governed Scotland. We have been desirous of getting a responsible Minister placed in charge of these public duties. Well, practically I suppose we may take it, after what the Lord Advocate has said, that the Secretary for Scotland is the Congested Districts Board. He told us that the Secretary for Scotland may do whatever he likes in the Local Government Board, and that the Board has no power without his sanction. We may assume that it is the same in regard to the Congested Districts Board. I think that is a satisfactory thing to know, at all events, and as the Lord Advocate is in this House the whipping boy for the Secretary for Scotland, he must expect us to visit on his devoted head the blame we attach to the doings of this wonderful Board. What has this wonderful Board been doing? The fact remains that although they have been in existence for two or three years, they have not migrated a single crofter, and they have done almost nothing in the way of extending holdings. I remember very vividly that some years ago a Committee sat upstairs considering the question of colonisation. We ransacked for places to which crofters could be advantageously and profitably sent, and the conclusion we came to was that there were no such places, and that if we were to relieve the congestion in the districts in the north-west of Scotland it must be by migration within their own country to places where they could find a better means of livelihood. It was in accordance with that finding that this Board was intended, no doubt tentatively at first, to move in that direction. The Lord Advocate says we must do it with patience, but there is a limit even to patience, and I think the principal criticism passed on this Report is that so little, in fact absolutely nothing, has been done for the very purpose for which the Board was called into existence. I must say that I do not know that I have spent a more entertaining ten minutes than those spent in reading the Report when it first came out, and the stories of the tricks the Board have played with seed potatoes and with divers animals in remote islands for breeding purposes. There are stories of potatoes from the bags of which when they were landed in the forlorn islands the labels had unfortunately been either torn away, or perhaps eaten by one of the prize animals carried in the same vessel—at all events, the labels were not forthcoming—with the result that all the potatoes were shovelled out to the inhabitants indiscriminately, and they very wisely refused to pay anything for them. Then we have the touching story of the three bees—[Cries of "Bee-hives"]—or, was it bee-hives?—it is quite immaterial—that the Board actually, with all this money at their disposal, placed in the careful hands of Mr. M'Intyre. My hon. friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire said our countrymen would not understand the humour and irony of these circumstances, but I do not agree with my hon. friend. I think they do understand irony, and they will see what someone said was—it is a strong word to use—the farce—but it nearly approached to a farce—of the proceedings of this Board. The whole thing was a ridiculus mus. Now that we have the three hives of bees, a few sittings of eggs, and a patient but ineffectual attempt to obtain the migration of crofters, I hope next year's Report will show some better, more active, and hopeful results. I do not think there is likely to be any very large benefit conferred upon that part of Scotland if their efforts are confined to the direction in which they have hitherto been exercised.

*Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire expressed a pious wish that a humorist would appear in the debate, and he has found one on his own front bench. I scarcely think the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's speech will, after all, commend it to the public to which he is really speaking—the public of Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman has indulged his capacity for humour so far that he has made some charges that are really, I think, somewhat grave when they come to be carefully weighed. He has spoken with disapprobation of the passage in the Report in which the Congested Districts Board deplore the loss of the Bill of last year. I am not going to treat that matter again, or deal with the ethics of the question whether the statement should have gone into the Report, but I would remind the House that what they were anxious to do —an anxiety which I think ought to have been treated without levity—was to have some form of practical education which would allow these young Highland boys and girls to get fair wages when they go out into the world. That I should have thought a very desirable object, and all the right hon. Gentleman can find to say about it is that the Congested Districts Board, after nibbling away at little schemes, were trying to get further away, and evading the main purpose of the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman sticks to that, let him do so. Evading the main purpose of the Bill is a fairly grave charge to make against a Minister of the Crown and the Board, because it simply means, of course, that their whole object is to defeat the purposes for which Parliament has entrusted them with the money As I said before, the true determination of this matter will depend not upon what the right hon. Gentleman or I say about it. I do not think the patient efforts of this Board, as they are detailed in the Report, will be nullified by witticisms—however congenial to the souls of a dull Committee—about three hives of bees, such as the right hon. Gentleman has given us in his speech.

Captain SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): No one is likely to retard anything of a beneficial character which can be done for the people of the north-west of Scotland, but the right hon. Gentleman must remember the debates which took place on the introduction of the Bill constituting this Board. Nothing is more plain, from the Reports we have had, than that the Board has not succeeded in carrying out in any large degree the policy of land migration, which was held out as the chief work the Board was to do. The Lord Advocate has reminded us that this Board is a continuation of the old policy of having a Vote of money on the Estimates for the Highlands and Islands of Scotland. That was followed by the Highlands and Islands Commission. The main recommendation of that Commission was that there should be an attempt made to carry out land migration and the extension of the crofters' holdings in the Highlands, and when the Bill constituting this Board was under consideration, grave complaints were made by Members on this side of the House that the Board would not succeed in carrying out those objects with the powers conferred by the Bill. It was urged that compulsory powers of purchase should be given to the Board, or it would not be able to effect its object. Compulsory powers were not given, and what has been the result? Land migration has been found to be impossible under present conditions. There is a paragraph in the Report which I hoped the Lord Advocate would explain. He says further powers are required by the Board to carry out the purposes it has in view; but he gives us no details of those further powers. It is perfectly clear that the Board is now going to justify its existence by an entirely different policy from that of land migration or the extension of crofters' holdings. It may be right or it may be wrong, but I confess I look with a considerable amount of favour on the ideas which are enunciated and indicated in the Report, though I think there has been a lamentable failure to carry those ideas into execution. It is all very well to tell us that we should be patient, and that if we object to this we ought to object to any money whatever being given to this purpose. It may be perfectly legitimate to say there should be money given, but surely before the money is voted there should be a policy. Surely Parliament should not have voted for this purpose the interest on more than £1,000,000, unless it had some scheme to carry into effect. Perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury could throw some light upon this point, because it was in his Election programme that this very item occurred—that we were to have public works on the west coast of Scotland. As far as I know, that promise has been implemented only with one or two insignificant piers and boat-slips, which are described in this Report. However good the object may be, and however beneficent the purpose it is endeavouring to carry out, it is not the original purpose for which the Board was constituted, and it does not strike at the root of the difficulty with which you have to deal in the north-west of Scotland. We have the analogy of Ireland, where a Congested Districts Board is part of the policy of killing Home Rule by kindness. It seems to me that the Irish analogy should be more closely studied. There are conditions in the Highlands which depend upon the land question, and which depend upon something being done to carry out the recommendations of the Commission to which I have alluded. Even in this Report we see that proprietors have refused to give land. There is one point I should like the Lord Advocate to explain. He seemed to indicate in his remarks that it was impossible to place the crofters under the Crofters Act. There is a passage in this Report which seems to indicate that the Board endeavoured to do this in these new holdings. On page 10 there are these words—

> "We propose that the lands to be assigned should be held by them under the Crofters Acts, but the proprietors objected, and ultimately it was arranged that a lease for thirty-one years should be granted to each tenant."

One rather infers from that that it was impossible to create what are practically new crofters' holdings. I gathered from the Lord Advocate's remarks——

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: What I said was that it was impossible for anyone to give a person the legal status of a crofter as under the Act. Of course it is possible to allow the rent to be fixed by arbitration under the Crofters' Commission.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: All these difficulties would not necessarily have arisen if there had been in the hands of the Board far wider powers, which Members on this side of the House sought to confer when the Board was originally constituted. Looking at the proceedings of this Board I entirely agree with my hon. friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire that this is a very extravagant method of proceeding to the end in view. There is a very large sum of money mounting up for the purposes of this Board entirely under the discretion of what is practically the Scotch Office, and it would have been far more sensible if, before the Board was constituted, there had been some effort to indicate the policy the Board was to carry out, and to lay that policy before the country. I am sure if it had been plainly seen by the House how very far short of such a policy the powers of this Board would land them, we should have made a stronger effort to confer adequate powers to deal with the main difficulties of the question in the Highlands of Scotland.

MR. CALDWELL: The Lord Advocate referred to the remarks in the Report about Members having blocked the Bill of last session. The object of putting the passage in the Report was to create a feeling in the minds of the crofter constituencies against their representatives in Parliament. That is the undoubted object, and what is complained of is that it amounts almost to a breach of the privileges of this House for an outside body of this kind to comment in their official Report upon the actions of Members of Parliament with a view to creating a prejudice against them in their constituencies. Such a breach is all the more unjustifiable from the fact that it is in a document signed by the Secretary for Scotland himself—a member of the other House and a member of the Government—who has no possible excuse for making a charge of that kind against any Member of the House, or attempting in any degree to prejudice a Member of this House in the eyes of his constituents. The Lord Advocate referred to an inquiry he made of me. My answer was this: These purposes may be beneficial in themselves, but what the Scotch Members object to is that they should be provided for out of money intended for the purpose of settling crofters upon their holdings, and that was the reason the notices of opposition to the Bill were put down. We know the Secretary for Scotland is not in sympathy with the policy of migration; the policy of the Government is more emigration than migration. But this Government may not always be in power, and if they cannot find a way to apply the money to the purposes to which their own Act of Parliament directed it to be applied. very possibly there may be a future Government in power which will be able to do so. Why did you not extend your objects at first, instead of limiting them as you did? The other purposes are more of an educational kind, and when we come to the Education Votes I will refer the Lord Advocate to a sum of £80,000 that Scotland should have just now under your own Education Acts, but of which she is deprived. You will there find ample material if you wish to give money for the purpose of doing these beneficent things for the crofters. All we say is, the purposes may be eminently useful in themselves, but they are altogether outside the scope of the Act. We wish the Board to carry out their own Act of Parliament, and to devote their attention to that; then after that they may go to other purposes.

Original Question again proposed.

*MR. WEIR called attention to the dual offices held by the Secretary to the Congested Districts Board. That gentleman was chief clerk in the Exchequer Office in Edinburgh, in which position he received a salary of £650, he received £150 a year for performing the duties of secretary to the Congested Districts Board, and there was a further sum of £150 a year which had to be paid to somebody to do the work which this gentleman was unable to do owing to his dual capacity. The hon. Member suggested that the two sums of £150 should be put together and used as a salary for a person who would give his whole time to the duties of secretary to the Board. This system of dual offices was a disgrace to a public Department, and it was time a protest was made. The Lord Advocate seemed to be under the impression that the Board was worked satisfactorily, but it had been clearly shown in the course of the evening that the secretary did his work in a most unsatisfactory manner. It was not easy to see how it could be otherwise while the secretary filled two or three, or, for aught the Committee knew, half a dozen offices. Members had a right to expect that the secretary should be acquainted with all that was going on in connection with the work of the Board, and when Mr. De Moleyns went up to the Island of Lewis it was the business of the secretary to have informed him what the state of matters was in connection with the potato spraying system there. Another matter to which he desired to call attention was in connection with a paragraph under the heading "Harbours." The Report stated that Portness Harbour and Breakwater were completed. The amount paid on the Portness Breakwater to the 31st March was £4,481 16s., and on Portness Harbour, £1,050. But the work was not completed, and a good deal more money would have to be spent before that was the case. The breakwater was most unsatisfactory, and the sand silted up the harbour continually. The harbour was of a most dangerous character, and it was a well-known fact that there was no other district in the whole of the British Isles where there were so many widows and orphans in consequence of the unsatisfactory harbour. Let the Lord Advocate himself go and see the deplorable state of matters. It was impossible either in London or Edinburgh to get a grasp of the state of affairs in that remote spot. People in England have no idea of the conditions of life there. The harbour and breakwater were in a very dangerous condition, and many thousands of pounds would have to be expended before matters were put right. As a protest against the dual offices held by the Secretary to the Congested Districts Board, he begged to move that the Vote be reduced by a sum of £10.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Item E be reduced by £10."—(Mr. Weir.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,649, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and expenses of the Fishery Board in Scotland and for Grants in Aid of Piers or Quays."

*MR. BUCHANAN: There have in years past been many discussions upon the policy of the Fishery Board for Scotland. For my part, I am somewhat weary of bringing forward the same grievances for redress, but I would venture on this occasion to point out that matters generally affecting fisheries in Scotland are in a somewhat serious position. I have taken the trouble to look at the Returns, not merely for the present year, but for the last five years. The facts are well known to those engaged in fishery matters, but they are not fully appreciated by the general public, nor by many hon. Members of this House. The facts are shortly these. The supply of fish in Scotland is not substantially increasing from year to year, although the cost of fish to the consumer is increasing, notwithstanding the vast improvements in the catching power of the fishermen on the coast of Scotland. So that the problem we have before us is that whilst in the course of the past few years a great deal more capital has been put into the fishing industry, and vessels of larger tonnage and better material and equipments have been employed, and the fishermen have gone further out from the coast in the pursuit of their calling, yet they have not succeeded in increasing the supply of fish or in diminishing the cost of fish to the consumer. I will not trouble the Committee with more than a figure or two, but I will give from the Fishery Board Returns the amount of fish landed in the past three years. I will take a good and a bad year ten years ago and compare it with a good and a bad year within the last three years. The year 1889 was a comparatively small catch, and 5,500,000 were landed. In 1893 the amount was 6,250,000. Last year the total was 5,100,000, and the year before 6,500,000. Taking the average for the past four years, and the average amount landed in the four years ten years ago, you would find the amount almost the same. If you search the figures of the Scotch Fishery Board Reports you will also find that the price of fish during that period has gradually been increasing, and you have evidence over and over again that the fishermen have to go further afield to catch the fish, which they formerly caught near our own coast. When the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was introducing the Bill dealing with undersized fish, during the present session, he stated that our fishing-grounds were being ruthlessly destroyed year after year by trawlers. I do not think we ever had a stronger statement of the case from our point of view than was laid down in those words during this session by the President of the Board of Trade. It is quite clear that there must be something wrong in such a state of affairs. Our legislative grievance is this. You pass certain Acts of Parliament and you do not put them into force. What I believe is a very real and serious grievance, both legislative and administrative, is the inefficient policing and illegal trawling. The results are of a much more serious character during the present year than we have ever seen before. We of course recognise that with the alteration of the character of this industry there must be a greater concentration year by year in the largest centres of the fishing industry, and that has been going on for some years, and is going on even now. Fishermen have been compelled, and have willingly adopted better combination, and have joined together to build larger vessels and have made use of better implements for catching their fish; but this year we have had the matter very forcibly brought before us by the fact that this migration of fishermen from small and ancient localities into the larger centres has not been simply a migration of families but of whole villages, and in my constituency we have not merely empty fishermen's houses, but one or two villages during the last year have been absolutely deserted by every human being who used to live there. This is a very serious matter, calling for the attention of the Government and the House, and if by any legislation this evil could be diminished very useful work would be done by this House and by the Government. I will not go back at length upon the arguments we have so often urged in former sessions during this Parliament, but one of our grievances is the continued non-effective enforcement of the law with regard to the closing of the Moray Firth. This is an old grievance which has gone on year after year, and the facts are well known to Members of this House, and more particularly to Scottish Members. The Lord Advocate himself took very immediate and effective steps against the British trawlers, but he has taken no effective steps—and the Government of which he is a member have never shown that they are prepared by negotiations with foreign Powers to take any effective steps—to bring this scandal to an end. Here you have in practically British waters, which are closed to British fishermen, foreign fishermen going about catching fish and landing them at British ports, while English and Scotch fishermen are not allowed to do so. I say that the Government ought to have made some effort during the time they have been in office to get the Governments of foreign countries bordering on the North Sea to join together to secure by an international agreement an abatement of this serious scandal in the administration of fishery laws. My constituency in East Aberdeenshire has suffered very much in this respect. Aberdeen being the principal trawling port, the trawlers as they go in and out catch all the fish they can by trawling along the coast. The result is that practically all the fishing in inshore waters in Aberdeenshire has been put an end to. It is rather strange that this part of the coast has been less patrolled by the Government cruisers than any other part of the coast. What has been the policy of the Government with regard to the sea police? A couple of years ago they withdrew this item from the Estimates and put it down as a charge on the local taxation account. It was not a fixed sum of money, and in previous years the Imperial Exchequer was drawn upon according to our needs in this respect, and we looked forward to our needs being satisfied. But even with this increase in the cost we have not found that the sea police arrangements are administered better than they were before. Then there is another question which we have constantly brought before the present Government. They have made no effort during the five years they have been in office to render effective the Scotch Sea Fisheries Act of 1895. That was a Bill passed by the late Liberal Government, and it empowered the Fishery Board of Scotland to extend the territorial limits for fishery purposes in certain parts of Scotland. When that Bill was passing through the House of Lords, Lord Salisbury, by an Amendment drafted by his own hand, inserted into that clause words providing that it should not come into operation except by international agreement with the Powers bordering on the North Sea. Within a few weeks after this Amendment was inserted Lord Salisbury came into office as Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, and he has made no substantial effort from that day to this to render effectual this clause in the Scotch Fisheries Act. I think we have, therefore, a grievance against the Government for having allowed five years to elapse without anything effectual being done in the matter. We know very well that the years of this Parliament are running out, and it is hardly likely that any effective legislation can be done by this Parliament during this session or the next session, which is the last. I think the fishermen and the fishing industry of this country are suffering under substantial grievances; and they are not confined to one class of fishermen alone, because the diminution in the catch and the increase in the price of fish is not confined to a certain class of fish, but we have the same irregularity in the returns of fish from year to year prevailing in the herring fishing industry, notwithstanding all the money that has been spent from year to year in investigating the habits of fish and scientific investigations. We still know very little in regard to the migration of fish and why they appear on one part of the coast in one year and disappear the next. I only allude to that question in passing, because the herring industry is the most important of all the fishing industries in Scotland, and I wish to show that it has suffered also. What I urge upon the Lord Advocate is that he should render effectual the laws now in operation. I urge this upon him very strongly on behalf, not only of the line fishermen, but also the trawlers and the herring fishermen, who also have their grievances, and I think some serious and substantial efforts should be made to get the various Powers in the North of Europe who are vitally interested like ourselves in the sea fisheries of the North Sea to come together, in order to see whether they cannot come to some substantial agreement as to the conditions under which fishing rights shall be exercised in particular areas. I do not believe for a moment that it would be difficult to get the various Powers to come to a decision in the matter if it was taken seriously in hand by a powerful Government like the British Government. We have been put off for the past few years by the Conference at Stockholm, which was got up by the King of Sweden for scientific purposes, and those who organised that Conference never intended that it should have any direct legislative effect, or that it should lead to legislative action. What we want is something very different. We want the question taken up as a matter of urgency in the interests of the fishing communities in England and Scotland, and in the interests of all the nations bordering on the North Sea. I believe there is still time to do this, and I would urge upon the Government, whilst Lord Salisbury occupies the influential position in the diplomatic world in Europe which he does, that they should organise a movement for bringing together the various Powers interested in order to deal with these questions, and to come to an agreement by which each nation will respect the laws made, and under which the law will be carried out effectually by this and other countries. I beg to move that this Vote be reduced by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,549, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I hope that hon. Members from Scotland will not take it amiss if I join in this discussion, for I should like to put one or two questions to the Lord Advocate. The question of steam trawling which the hon. Member has raised is one which interests us very much in Ireland, and perhaps I may be able to glean some information which may be useful to my constituency in the matter. We have been trying for a long time to get Irish waters properly policed, and to have the ravages of the steam trawlers put an end to, and although we have not been able to get cruisers of our own, we have hopes that something will be done for us in the near future. I am anxious to know how many of these cruisers are at the disposal of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and also what assistance is given to the Scotch Fisheries Board by the Admiralty. In Ireland we have repeatedly asked the Admiralty to assist us in this matter, but the Admiralty have not done anything. Then I should like to ask for information with reference to the special brand which I believe exists for Scotch herrings. We have been trying for a long time to have a brand for Irish herrings, but we have not yet succeeded. I do not know whether this matter comes within the purview of the Scotch Office, but if it does, I should be indebted to the right hon. Gentleman if he would inform me what the procedure was in Scotland by which this brand for Scotch herrings was obtained; and perhaps he will also tell us what was the effect of the establishment of the brand on the Scotch fisheries. We have an idea that a similar brand in Ireland would be an assistance and an encouragement to Irish fisheries. I would also express the hope that the Government will seriously and generally deal with the question of foreign trawlers in territorial waters. We in Ireland have to complain very much of the depredations of steam trawlers, and I hope that the time has come when the Government will put a limit to their operations. I should be glad to add my voice, as the representative of an Irish constituency in which there is a large fishing interest, to the appeal which has been made to the Government to take up this question in a definite and determined manner and to endeavour to deal with it as soon as possible. I do not desire to stand longer between hon. Members from Scotland and their Minister, but I hope the points I have mentioned will be considered.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I hope the Scotch Members will also forgive me, as an English Member representing an important fishing constituency, for intervening in this debate. I think this is a question of importance to every part of the United Kingdom, and one which has been forcibly brought before us by a certain Bill which is now being considered by a Select Committee of the House. I cannot, of course, forecast the recommendations of that Committee, but one thing has come out very clearly in the evidence, and that is that Parliament has been making grants year after year to the Scotch Fisheries Board largely for the purpose of assisting the scientific investigation which it was resolved to undertake as a result of the recommendations of a Royal Commission some years ago, as to whether trawlers did or did not affect the supply of fish. These experiments have been conducted in the Moray Firth, and we have been told very clearly in the Committee to which I have referred, that the expenditure has been practically rendered futile—first of all, because the vessel employed is inadequate for the purpose, being described by officials of the Fisheries Board and other competent witnesses as being utterly unsuited owing to its size; and secondly, we are told that very little reliance can be placed on the results of the experiments because of the action of foreign trawlers in the Firth.

*THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Gentleman is referring to evidence given before a Select Committee, he is not in order in doing so until the Committee has reported. If he is referring to evidence obtained in any other way he is of course in order.

*MR. H. S. FOSTER: I was referring to matters of public knowledge which have appeared in the Reports of the Scotch Fishery Board. An hon. Member opposite spoke of the state of things in the Moray Firth as being little short of a scandal, and as I understand, we have no power beyond the three-mile limit to prohibit foreign trawlers from fishing, but we can apparently prohibit our own fellow-subjects in any part of the world, as in the case of the Moray Firth and the Behring Sea. It is a matter of the very greatest importance to our fisheries that the Government should make some serious effort to arrive at an international agreement with the North Sea Powers for the protection of the fisheries. That was urged by a Committee of this House in 1893, and so far as I am aware, nothing has since been attempted in that direction. There is a theory that that would be very difficult until we have done something in the matter ourselves; but we have actually prohibited our own men from fishing in what are practically our own waters, though for certain purposes they are also the high seas. Up to the present we have got no sort of assistance from foreign countries, and I believe no serious endeavour to secure it has been made. It is surely nothing short of a scandal that Scotch trawlers should be prohibited from fishing in these waters, while we allow foreign trawlers to fish in them. That is a great hardship, and applies to all Her Majesty's subjects who might desire to fish in these waters. I hope the Lord Advocate will be able to give the Committee some assurance that it is the intention of the Government at an early date to invite the various Powers bordering on the North Sea to come into a conference in order to consider whether some steps should not be taken by international agreement, I will not say to stop over-fishing, because that can be regulated by supply and demand at any time, but to protect those areas from which Scotland draws the largest supply of her fish. That will be found to be the most effective remedy. At the present moment the goose that lays the golden eggs is being killed. There has been an immense increase in the capital employed in the fishing industry and in the catching power of trawlers, not only in Scotland, but in other parts of the coast of the United Kingdom, and unless something is done to protect the fishing areas—and nothing effective can be done except by international agreement—the result will be that the price of fish will continue to rise, because the supply will continue to fall. I apologise for intervening between the Scotch Members and the Lord Advocate, but the question is one in which increasing interest is now being taken in every part of the United Kingdom.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): The Scotch Members ought to thank the hon. Baronet, and also the hon. Member opposite, for having taken up the cause we have so often urged in this House—namely, that increased attention should be given to the condition of the fishing industry in Scotland. One matter which was mentioned by the hon. Member opposite struck me very forcibly. He talked about the amount of capital that was now being embarked in the fishing industry. That is perfectly true, but the fishermen cannot take their capital out of that industry, because they cannot change their calling all at once. I have often wondered whether the Government are alive to the very serious condition of affairs all round our coasts. In my own constituency last winter men were literally starving, and, rightly or wrongly, they attributed their condition to the amount of trawling going on. I have only risen to heartily support the motion of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire.

*MR. WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I wish to ask a question with reference to the salmon fishery on the River Forth. A decision was given in the House of Peers by which salmon fishing is prohibited in a certain way—namely, by "took and haul" and "hang nets," but nothing whatever was said about the universal practice of drift net fishing, and I have been asked to ascertain from the right hon. Gentleman whether or not the decision prohibits that practice, and also whether stake-nets are prohibited.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I do not think it necessary to enter into the question of trawling, because I have frequently expressed the same views as were expressed by the Member for East Aberdeenshire to-night. I want especially to call the attention of the Lord Advocate to another matter raised by my hon. friend, and that is the migration of fishermen to the towns. This matter has been going on for many years, and it is a very slow but very serious social revolution. In my own constituency villages which twenty years ago were important fishing centres have not now a single boat. Finnon, which gave its name to the celebrated brand of haddocks, has at the present moment scarcely a fisherman, and the same thing is happening in other villages. I do not suggest that the Government can stop this migration, because I believe it is a movement which depends on questions of political economy beyond the limits of the Government, but I think that the Government should recognise it and not shut their eyes to it. I believe that the main cause of this migration is that the fishermen in the small harbours cannot now pursue their calling with success because these harbours will not accommodate the larger boats now required. Not only that, but the insurance companies refuse to insure boats in harbours which are not entirely safe. Recently a great disaster happened in a small fishing town, and not one of the boats which had been lost were insured. I myself reflected on the fishermen for not having done so, and was informed that the insurance companies would not insure a single boat from that harbour. It seems to me that the Scotch Fisheries Board does not recognise the state of things which exists. It is too ready to grant sums of money to small farmers on whom it should not be spent. I think we had a case in the constituency of my hon. friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire in which a large sum of money was spent on a harbour, and yet the fishermen left the harbour and came into Aberdeen. It does seem to me that this money, under such circumstances, was wasted, and that it would be much better for the Fisheries Board to spend money on the large harbours that could accommodate large boats, and that would be suitable for the requirements of modern fishing. But that is not the policy of the Board. Whenever a harbour is not altogether a fishing harbour—if merchandise is brought into it—then it gets no grant. Stokehaven, which might be made one of the finest harbours on the coast, has applied over and over again for a grant, but has been refused because it is not purely a fishing harbour, although if it got a grant it could have accommodated many villages in the vicinity. I think the Fishery Board might recognise the trend of modern affairs better than it does.

*MR. WEIR said he should like to ask the Lord Advocate what steps had been taken under the North Sea Fisheries Convention to keep foreign trawlers out of the Moray Firth. Last year there were fifty-two foreign trawlers fishing in the Firth. Year after year the matter has been brought forward and, he regretted to say that nothing had been done to bring about the cessation of such an unsatisfactory state of affairs, and instead of matters showing an improvement they were going from bad to worse. The answer given to him in the House some time ago showed that twenty-three more foreign trawlers were engaged in the Moray Firth last year than in the previous year. Was it not time that some energetic steps should be taken by the Secretary for Scotland, and his colleagues in the Cabinet, to put a stop to such a state of matters? The Committee heard from another hon. Member representing a fishing constituency that whole villages and towns were being depopulated on account of the trawlers carrying on their work within the three mile limit. He was not condemning the trawlers, but they should fish out at sea. Why did not Lord Salisbury take steps to remedy that grievance, and allow line fishermen a chance of getting a living? On the 3rd April last he had asked for information as to how many days foreign trawlers had been fishing in the Moray Firth, and he was informed that the details he had asked for could not be given without going over the logs of the cruisers for the whole year. He thought that the Committee had better know where they were. Was it that the commanders of the cruisers set the Secretary for Scotland at defiance, or was the reply merely an evasive answer to get rid of a troublesome question? If these commanders set the Secretary for Scotland at defiance, what had the Lord Advocate to say? If he were in the Transvaal he would have them shot straight away in the interests of discipline. One of these commanders was paid £100 a year by the Fishery Board for Scotland, and yet he set that Board at defiance. He hoped the Secretary for Scotland would show a little more backbone in such matters. British trawlers were excluded from the Moray Firth, while foreign trawlers fished in it. He did not want British trawlers in the Firth, but he thought all the trawlers ought to be cleared out. It was a gross injustice that foreign trawlers should be allowed to sweep the harbours of the Moray Firth and take the fish to English ports for sale. That ought to be stopped, and he sincerely trusted that the Lord Advocate would impress on the Secretary for Scotland the necessity of not allowing the matter to pass by from year to year. It had a serious effect indeed on the fishermen along the coast of Scotland. He had received a copy of a memorial within the last few days, which had been sent to the Secretary for Scotland from ten different associations in Scotland, urging the Government to send down one or two more cruisers to watch the coast around the Hebrides, which was a magnificent fishing ground. They were told that captures were effected at times—of course they were; but the very fact that there were so many captures showed that the evil was an increasing one. Let the Secretary for Scotland approach the First Lord of the Admiralty on the matter. He himself had been successful in getting a cruiser out of the right hon. Gentleman for the coast of Scotland, and if a humble Member could do that why could not the Secretary for Scotland do it also? He asked what was the Lord Advocate about to allow such a state of things to continue? Let the trawlers fish outside if they liked, but they should be prevented from acting the part of sea robbers and stealing what belonged to the line fishermen. The fishing villages were being desolated because of the trawlers and because of the insufficient number of cruisers to look after them. It was true patriotism to prevent men who would fill the ranks of the Army and Navy from being swept away into the large cities, because the Government could not get in the slums of large towns men like they could get in the Hebrides and along the coast of Scotland. In 1894 there were 11,217 registered fishing boats in Scotland, and in 1898 there were only 10,485, or a decrease of 732.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): What about the trawlers?

*MR. WEIR said that no doubt the Lord Advocate would be able to furnish the hon. Member with the information he desired. What had become of those boats and their crews? Many of the men had gone into the towns, and did the best they could to get a living. But in England what was the result? The English fishing boats had increased in the same period by 320. He could only suppose that the fisheries round the coast of England were better looked after by the Admiralty cruisers. They did not remain in harbour at night. They were out at sea doing their work, and preventing the fishing beds being depleted by trawlers in the same way as they were on the coasts of Scotland. He asked the right hon. Gentleman to look into this Department, for which he was solely and absolutely responsible, and see that the cruisers did not remain in harbour during the night. Night was the time to go out and catch the trawlers, and send them to the bottom of the sea if necessary. Trawlers were the curse of the Lews, where people who used to get a comfortable living were now almost starving in consequence of their action. He appealed once more to the Lord Advocate to confer with the First Lord of the Treasury, and get more money for cruisers, and with the Admiralty to obtain an addition to the fleet of cruisers. He was sure that with a little careful management and negotiation much more could be done in that way than at present. He had found, as a humble Member of the House, that the First Lord of the Admiralty was "come-at-able" and conciliatory. He now came to the question of harbours and piers. There was a sum of £3,000 for grants-in-aid for the construction of piers and quays. It ought to be a very much larger sum, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would have it increased, because it was so badly wanted. Portmahomack harbour was silting up with sand, and so was Balintore; while at Avoch, on the east coast of Ross-shire, fourteen or fifteen fishing boats had been smashed for want of shelter. On the west coast there was Portnagurran, Broad Bay, Island of Lewis. The Walpole Commission reported that a harbour was badly wanted there, and would cost £30,000. That Commission seemed to be dust thrown in the eyes of the Scotch Members to stave off the evil day. No effort had been made to build the harbour at Portnagurran, where at present there was only a little boat-slip, which was of no earthly good in a storm. A harbour at Portnagurran would not only be of advantage to the fishing village there, but would form a splendid harbour of refuge for the whole north-west of Scotland. What he complained of was that nothing was done, and though any amount of money could be provided for the landlords, no effort was made to carry out the useful works recommended to the Government by the Commission which they themselves had appointed. There was great laxity in the administration of the Fishery Board for Scotland. Of course the right hon. Gentleman had told them that the Fishery Board was under the control of the Secretary for Scotland, who put the muzzle or the brake on; but would the Lord Advocate see what could be done to get these matters attended to? Other hon. Members could speak of the wants of their own constituencies; he spoke of a few of his own which were so sadly and grossly neglected. They were asked to vote £365 a year for a scientific superintendent, and £262 a year for an assistant inspector of sea fisheries, and it was stated in a footnote that these sums included an allowance for office rent. He supposed that they put that allowance in their pockets. Where were these offices? He did not believe they existed. But if they did exist, how was it that the office of the Fishery Board, in Edinburgh could not be used for these purposes? He had visited the Fishery Board Office, where there were a number of very elegant rooms which did not seem to be very much used. It was a dead and dreamy sort of place; some of the rooms might be utilised by these gentlemen instead of the taxpayers' money being taken for other offices. It was very painful to bring forward such matters year after year, and to find that no effort was made by the Scottish Office to remedy the evils that existed. The Secretary for Scotland was paid £2,000 a year; but he would pay him £5,000 if the right hon. Gentleman would get the work thoroughly well done. He thought that Lord Salisbury might easily have arranged with the North Sea Powers to bring about a settlement of the Fisheries Convention. It was a pity that this country had not taken the initiative at the Hydrographical Conference. That had been done by Sweden, and Great Britain had been compelled to follow the lead of poor little Sweden. This matter of the Fisheries Convention had been going on for two and a half years, and it was time that the Papers were in the hands of the Members of the House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said it was impossible not to feel deep sympathy with the hon. Gentleman opposite. He had informed the Committee that he had gone to the Fishery Board Office, and having expounded his views on Fisheries to the members of the Board, he found them dreamy.

*MR. WEIR said he never said anything of the kind. He had gone to the Fishery Board Office and found many elegant rooms, but they were empty, and he thought they might be put to a better use. He never said that the Fishery Commissioners were dreamy; it was the rooms that were dreamy. He hoped that the hon. Member would be more careful, and not misrepresent him.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that if the hon. Member found the rooms were empty, it was very clear that the Commissioners knew the hon. Member was coming. It was impossible not to sympathise with hon. Members opposite in their complaint as to the depletion of the fishing villages. The line fishermen were fine sailors, and better men could not be found along the coast; but he did not think that the remedy for the misfortunes of these line fishermen would be discovered in the direction indicated by the hon. Member, who suggested that the Lord Advocate should take command of a gunboat and go about sinking all the trawlers which came within the three-mile limit. But if the Lord Advocate did that they should lose his presence in the House.

AN HON. MEMBER: We would not miss him here.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the hon. Gentleman might go as his first lieutenant. The Scottish Fishery Board was the only Department of the State which was occupied with scientific investigations in regard to fish and fisheries, and the total Vote only amounted to £18,000. It was true that £1,000 was paid in England towards the funds of the Marine Biological Institute; but he thought it was disgraceful and discreditable to this country that so small an amount should be paid in the United Kingdom, when they remembered that the United States had a permanent Fishery Commission for the same purposes, and for which it paid no less a sum than £97,000 a year. The reason he was so anxious for a scientific investigation into the life history of fish and their migrations was that at the present moment there existed the most profound ignorance in regard to all these matters. His belief was that it was a delusion that trawlers destroyed the line fisheries. Most fishermen believed that the eggs of large edible fish were laid upon the ground, and that when the trawl lay upon the ground it destroyed those eggs, and consequently the fish, but they now knew that to be wrong. They now knew that the eggs lay upon the water, and that the trawl therefore did no harm. He believed the allegation against the trawlers was absolutely unfounded. It might be that the condition of the line fishermen was due to causes which the Government could not help. It had been said that the number of line fishermen was decreasing, and many of them may have gone inland, or crossed the border and come to England, and given up the calling of a line fisherman for some other occupation, but even now there was an enormous number of men still engaged in that occupation. With regard to the Moray Firth, he did not know whether any man could defend the action of those responsible for excluding English and Scotch fishermen from that part of the Moray Firth which was, and always must remain, open to the rest of the world. Whatever happened, this country could not undertake to police the high seas, and though we might exclude our own people we could not exclude foreigners from trawling in that part of the Moray Firth, which must always remain open to the fishing fleets of the world. He could never understand why that portion of the Moray Firth was closed to British fishermen. With regard to an international agreement, that was not an easy thing to enter into, but, assuming that it could be entered into, would it be wise? There was an enormous number of fishermen carrying on their occupation round our coasts, and if such an agreement was come to the boats of all these men would be liable to be boarded, searched, and detained, not by our own gunboats, but the police boats of every foreign nation. He was not prepared to go that length, and, if the gunboats of all nations were given such power over all our fishermen who fish the North Sea, we should very soon repeal it. He did not believe that that was the remedy. Some of the evils were, no doubt, somewhat exaggerated. He was convinced that the decrease was due to other causes than the depredations of the trawlers, and he hoped the Committee would consider very carefully any action they might take in the matter.

MR. SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire) said that, so far as he could see, whenever this Vote was discussed hon. Gentlemen immediately attacked the trawling industry. He did not believe in the breaking of the law by trawlers, but he did not think these constant attacks were justified. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had, he thought, hit the nail on the head. If there had been anything wrong in the action taken with regard to the Moray Firth, it was the exclusion from that water of the British trawlers. The matter had been approached from a wrong standpoint by the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, and Scotchmen, of all men, should not be the ones to take up such a position as they had with regard to it from an economic point of view. The fact of the matter was, the fishing industry was undergoing a great change. Trawling was as great an advance upon line fishing as the express train upon the stage coach, and it must inevitably take its place. The number of line fishermen had no doubt diminished, but there was no harm in that; they had not disappeared, as the hon. Gentleman would have the Committee believe, they had simply taken to other occupations and moved into the towns. The population of Aberdeen, where the air was just as salubrious, was increasing, and its wealth was increasing by leaps and bounds, owing to the trawling industry, and these fishermen were to be found there. Hon. Members speaking of the destruction of fish appeared to think that a day was coming when the supply would not be equal to the demand, but no such misapprehension need exist, for the fact had been abundantly proved that if all the world was to feed upon fish, and nothing else, there was abundance in the sea, and the supply would always exceed the demand.

MR. HEDDERWICK said that, but for the remarks of the hon. Member for King's Lynn and the remarkable speech of the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, he should not have intervened in the debate. The hon. Member for King's Lynn had rather missed the point, which was trawling within the three-mile limit, and had endeavoured to draw the attention of the Committee away from that point by suggesting that the whole matter should be settled by some great Commission. There would be no objection to a Commission which would set at rest much which was not at present known with regard to this subject; but the immediate point was not in connection with this great scientific problem; the immediate question revolved round the law which had been made by the House that no trawling should be allowed within a limit of three miles from the shore. If that law was broken it was as much the duty of the Government to arrest the offenders as it was their duty to arrest a housebreaker or a thief. The hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty was therefore right when he complained and found fault with the Fishery Board. Day and night on the lonely shores of Scotland that law was continually being violated, and it was only fair to say that the efforts made for policing these waters were not adequate to cope with the violaters of the law. The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire was, no doubt, animated by admirable desires when he deprecated the attacks made upon the trawlers, but what he (Mr. Hedderwick) wished to point out was that there was room for the line fishermen and the trawlers as well, if trawlers conformed to the law and did not trawl where they had no right to trawl—but where they did—to the great detriment of the line fishermen, who, as the Lord Advocate had pointed out, were most valuable men to the State. There were 10,000 men engaged in trawling, against 34,000 line fishermen, who had to earn their living under conditions of great peril, and who by that very peril provided the Navy with the best men. The hon. Member was under an entire misapprehension if he supposed that all parts of the ocean were stocked with edible fish. If the hon. Member went to one part of the ocean he might find no fish at all, whilst if he went to another he would find a breed of fish that he had never seen before. If the ocean was swarming with fish, how was it that English soles were not found on the coast of Spain, for instance, or New York? English turbot was not found in all parts of the sea. Fish had their habitats and feeding grounds in particular places, and though they laid their spawn on the water the spawn came close to the shore and only gradually receded into the deeper water, but never into the deep parts of the ocean. Some fish bred in some parts and some in others, and those parts of the coast where they bred were invaluable as nurseries, and it was as much to the interest of the trawler as of the line fisherman that these nurseries should be kept inviolate. It was better for the trawler to fish in deep water, because there he would get the mature fish that were bred in the shallows. If, owing to the competition which existed, and the absence of protection, these nurseries were invaded and harried and scarified so that no fish could find time to rest or breed there, the result must inevitably be that our great fishery beds would be rendered sterile. The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, he knew, had no desire to encourage the trawlers to break the law, and he would no doubt agree with the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty in his appeal to the Government that they should do something more than they had done up to the present to preserve these spawning beds and breeding grounds and the waters within the three-mile limit from the depredations of the trawlers.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: The debate to which we have listened has ranged over a great variety of subjects. I think we are much indebted to the hon. Gentleman who brought the subject of sea fisheries before the House, because it is one which really deserves to be much more widely discussed and known than it is at present. The opinions which have been expressed on one side and the other by various Members during the debate to-night seem to show that there is a considerable conflict of opinion and diversity of view in regard to the question of the North Sea fisheries. The hon. Gentleman who brought forward the subject pointed out how, in his opinion, undoubtedly the exhaustion of the North Sea fisheries had been made clear. The fishermen now do go further in pursuit of their calling, and that in spite of enormously increased catching power. In spite of greater efficiency, fishermen have to go greater distances than ever in order practically to maintain, and no more than maintain, the present supply of fish. If those who are interested in the development of the country neglect the physical resources of the sea, which are so valuable a source of food supply to the country, we shall inevitably have to do what has been done in foreign countries—in the United States and other parts of the world—in the way of investigating the question of fish food supply. What has been done in other countries shows undoubtedly how far behind we have lagged in this matter. The real truth of the matter is that there has been considerable over-fishing in the seas in which we fish. Although there is no scientific investigation to support the theory, it is quite possible and probable that the supply of fish is inexhaustible, as only fish of a certain kind and age come into the estuaries and bays and inlets of the country. I think, therefore, it is clear that the supply of fish in the North Sea is not necessarily recruited by fish coming in from other parts of the world. All these points remain very much matters of doubt and supposition, very much matters of hypothesis, and I do not think it is for any of us to dogmatise on the subject. My purpose in rising is to enforce one consideration upon the attention of the Lord Advocate, which has a bearing on this matter. It would be of no service at present to enter into the controversy which has been raised to-night as to the closing or non-closing of the Moray Firth. In my opinion, for what it is worth, the closing of the Moray Firth is entirely justifiable not only on purely scientific grounds, but on economical and social grounds, and, if you like, on political grounds in the best sense of the word. The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire has pointed out how a transition is going on in the fishing industry as in other industries to which he referred, but it is surely proper statesmanship on the part of any Government to modify and reduce as far as possible the inevitable friction and hardship involved in any great transition of the kind. More than that, I think that, going from present-day considerations to those of the future, it will be found that as a field for investigation the Moray Firth is very valuable to this country, and that it is possible, as I hope it may be later on, for co-operation between the North Sea Powers to advance further than they have at present in investigating the subject. It will be seen that we have done our duty in endeavouring to investigate questions which can only be investigated in a closed area. We shall have done our duty so far as lies in our power in having other areas closed so that scientific research may be valuably assisted in the future. Various suggestions and statements were made in the debate which I daresay it will be for the Lord Advocate to take notice of, and which he is far better qualified to deal with than I am. But be that as it may, I regret that this debate should assume an aspect of wrangling between different classes of fishermen in the country. There is room for both, and I wish to point out a consideration which should not be lost sight of in regard to the fisheries in Scotland. A very valuable part of the fisheries in Scotland, in common with other parts, is the herring fisheries. In considering the livelihood, circumstances, and conditions of the fishermen of Scotland, you must take into account that 70 per cent. of the catch and 50 per cent. of the value of the fish in Scotland are herrings, and, therefore, in so far as that proportion goes, and so far as that interest goes, they are entirely withdrawn from any controversy whatever between line fishermen and trawl fishermen, whose industry is confined to white, flat, or round fish, which must be distinguished entirely from the herring fisheries. As long as you have herring fisheries you must consider what their interest is and what the occupation of the fishermen is for the rest of the year. In regard to the Moray Firth, I wish to impress upon the Lord Advocate the inadequacy of the "Garland" as a ship for scientific investigation. No one knows better than the right hon. Gentleman himself the inadequacy of the "Garland," for it has been pointed out by the Fishery Board and in the Committee Report of 1893. The investigations which the Fishery Board have conducted have been hampered and to some extent rendered nugatory by the inefficiency of the "Garland." Practically that ship can do no very great work, except on the west coast, and everyone knows t requires a sea-going ship, well equipped and of sufficient size, to do the work some of the trawlers do on the east coast of Scotland; and in order to bring the investigations up to date and make them useful for the purpose of comparison with the practical work done by vessels of much larger size, I would urge most respectfully the right hon. Gentleman that in order to carry out the wish expressed by the Fishery Board for Scotland it is very necessary to equip them with a better vessel than at present. It is obvious to everyone who reads the Fishery Board Report as to the size of the vessels sent out to follow the trawlers within the three-mile limit. I think there should be a cruiser able to do that work, but the Government should look to the further strengthening of the fleet now engaged in co-operation with the ships of the Royal Navy in policing these waters. As a matter of fact the policing of these waters is a very serious cost to the country, and I think the system is more or less on its trial. Many critics have during this debate rather cast doubt on the advisability of a strong enforcement of the three-mile limit. The three-mile limit is not peculiar to this country; it is common to all the countries which have coasts on the North Sea; and I agree entirely with what was said by the hon. Member for the Wick Burghs, that that being the law we should have it enforced.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Major JAMESON, Clare, W.). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (continuing): The consideration I wish to enforce on the House is that the three-mile limit is a practical system, and, apart from any controversy between liners and trawlers, we must enforce that if only to give the system a trial. There are many critics who say that we get no gain by this—no gain in the fish food supply, no gain to the interest of the country in any respect. That is a matter of question, and one which we shall have to settle later on by investigation, but by all means let us have efficient methods of policing. Early in the debate great doubt was thrown upon the possibility of policing the North Sea as a whole. The hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn talked about policing the high seas. Let us talk about the North Sea and not go further afield at present. There is every evidence to show, not from this country alone but from other countries, that there has been exhaustion there. I mention this to impress my own view in regard to international action in this matter. Whether justified or not, I believe there is a strong conviction in the minds of some hon. Members here and some people outside the House that the Government has not done all it could to advance the policy of international co-operation in this direction. We have never been able, so far as I am aware, to get any satisfactory assurance that the Government has really done anything practical in this matter. It may require time, I admit, to deal with the great difficulties of the situation, but as it is in the interest of foreign countries bordering on the North Sea not less than our own interest, surely that affords an opportunity for pressing the idea of protecting in some way the fisheries of the North Sea. I cannot avoid the conviction that the Government have not done as much as might have been done to press forward this question, whether as regards an extended limit on the closing of areas, or whatever the proper proposal is. The Government have not convinced a number of people interested in this question that they have really made any practical and earnest endeavour to obtain any measure of international co-operation. Everything that was made known to the House—and by that we are obliged to judge—in regard even to the earlier attempts at co-operation seemed to me to indicate very great supineness in the matter, and I regret it most truly, for I believe from the evidence that comes from all sides that it is only by such international co-operation that we can have any hope of preserving the valuable fishing grounds of the North Sea, by whatever means it may be desirable to protect them. In the first place, let us do all we can in this country to inform ourselves in regard to the fisheries of the country. The Fishery Board for Scotland has been instanced to-night as having done most valuable work in this direction. I would plead with the Lord Advocate and the Government to enable that Board to do its work effectively, and for that purpose to equip it more efficiently with the means of scientific investigation. The point I wish to urge upon him is the inefficiency of the present vessel for scientific investigation. Let us go further if you like, and endeavour to organise the fisheries of the other parts of the United Kingdom, so that it may be clearly shown that this country at any rate is doing what it can in this respect. The fact that hon. Members for Ireland and also for England have taken part in this debate seems to indicate that interest in this question is spreading. It is a very good thing that it should, because the fishing industry is a very valuable one, whether as regards the food supply of the country or occupation for the fishermen; but when you look beyond Scotland there is a lamentable want of organisation. Neither in England nor Ireland is there organisation comparable at all——

*THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the remarks of the hon. Member on this matter were not relevant to the Vote under consideration.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: I will certainly endeavour to keep within the limits. Earlier in the debate the whole question of the North Sea was brought up in connection with the Stockholm Conference, to which this Government sent a delegate last year. I was only trying to point out that if we wish to stand well in any international effort to preserve the fisheries of the North Sea, first of all we should do what we can at home. The £18,000 which is reckoned Scotch expenditure in connection with this work is for a service which ought to be borne by the whole of the United Kingdom. Everyone interested in the question recognises the valuable work done by the Fishery Board for Scotland. Let that work be extended, and carried on not only in Scotland, but in England and Ireland. Let the territorial limits be properly policed, not only off Scotland, but off England and Ireland. I venture to suggest that there should be a thorough inquiry into the condition of the fisheries of this country. In 1863 there was a very valuable Commission, of which Professor Huxley and Sir James Kerr were members. They, with great labour and pains, placed on record the results of perhaps the most valuable investigation that has taken place in this matter. There was another Commission about 1883, which, I think, was confined to the investigation of the effect of beam-trawling in the North Sea. There was also a Commission in 1893, but the weakness of it was this—and I think the same thing will be found in connection with any other Committee assembled within these walls to investigate this question—that you cannot get proper evidence at this time of the year, when fishermen are employed elsewhere. I mention that point to enforce the desirability of having a further inquiry into the whole subject. Let the inquiry take what form it may, and whatever form the Government deem most desirable. Here we are in 1900, having had no real inquiry into the subject since 1863. If we are ever to enter into any international agreement on this matter we must first be thoroughly satisfied as to our own facts, and have an opinion based on those facts. We ought to have a distinct policy to advocate, and endeavour to carry it out with the help and co-operation of other nations. We are not doing so much as we ought to be doing in this matter; we are not doing as much as the magnitude and relative importance of this great interest of the country justify. I would urge most earnestly that everything possible should be done to create public interest in this question, and to convince the public that it really is important that these interests, very valuable in themselves and very important to the country as a whole, which are threatened with extinction, should receive consideration and investigation.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) agreed that these debates were almost the same every year; most of the speeches had been so similar to those delivered during the preceding four or five years that one might almost have had a phonograph and reeled off the old speeches instead of having a fresh debate. There were always the same complaints as to the neglect of the Fishery Board, the extension of the three-mile limit, the grievance about Moray Firth, the international agreement, and so forth, but nothing got any forwarder. There was one point which had advanced a little during the year, and that was that more Members had recognised the necessity for having a proper scientific inquiry into the condition of the fisheries. That was a very material point, as Members who asked for international action were really a little premature, because no international agreement could be arrived at until there were the proper scientific data to go upon. So little was absolutely known in the matter; it was not known even to what extent trawling was doing harm. It was always assumed that trawling was doing harm, and several Members had gone back to that well-worn theme in the course of the evening, but the extent of the damage was unknown. A valuable contribution to the debate had been made by the hon. Member who called attention to other causes which were depleting the supply, and he commended that speech to the attention of the Lord Advocate and the Government. The question of the Moray Firth, again, was an old grievance, and he adverted to it merely to call attention to the ridiculous position in which the question now stood. It had been already pointed out that the only effect of the present law was to allow foreign trawlers to go there, while our own fishermen were prevented. The number of trawlers in the Moray Firth had been estimated at twenty-three, but according to the evidence supplied to him there were sometimes as many as fifty foreign trawlers there. Moray Firth was a fairly large piece of water, but still, fifty trawlers was a very large number for such an area, and it must be perfectly obvious that the presence of those trawlers entirely destroyed the value of any experiment in the closing of the Firth to our own fishermen. The Committee should remember it was proposed to close the Moray Firth not as a permanent measure, but for a certain time in order to enable the experiment to be tried, and to see whether the supply would increase if the spawning grounds were not disturbed by the operation of trawlers. But four or five years ago the foreign trawlers appeared, their numbers had continued to increase, and it was admitted on all hands that their presence entirely vitiated the experiment, and that it was not worth while continuing it. The experiment could not now be properly tried, and it was very doubtful whether, if the British trawler were allowed in, it would further vitiate the experiment. However, he did not wish to argue that question, but all were agreed that the value of the experiment was destroyed by the presence of the foreign trawlers, and there was also the rankling sense of injustice in the minds of the line fishermen when they saw the foreign trawlers coming in and reaping this harvest. Surely such an absurd condition, which no one had denounced more warmly and clearly than the present Prime Minister some years ago, would not be allowed by the Government to continue indefinitely. The matter would have to be dealt with, either by the condition being withdrawn, or by prohibiting foreign trawlers going into the Firth. To make an international agreement such as that would involve, some consideration would have to be given to the foreign trawlers, or an arrangement would have to be made covering the whole of the North Sea. With regard to the general question, the only interest which had to be considered was that of the consumer—not only the consumer of the present, but also the consumer of the future. In these fisheries, particularly those of the North Sea, there was a large and important source of national wealth; it was alleged that that source of national wealth was being wasted by improvident methods of fishing, and certainly it was a matter for investigation. The remedy for some of the injuries suffered by the fishing industry was to be found in getting a proper knowledge of the practical effects of the present system; and, considering the great difficulties which must necessarily arise, that knowledge could not be acquired without some elaborate apparatus, without the expenditure of some years upon the task, and without the co-operation of the principal maritime Powers adjoining the North Sea. The Stockholm Conference seemed to offer an opportunity of having such a joint investigation, and perhaps the Lord Advocate would be able to tell the Committee what progress that Conference had made, and whether its investigations were being conducted on a sufficiently large scale. Several Members had observed that the Fishery Board, although it was prosecuting its inquiries, did not devote enough money or employ sufficient apparatus or observers to make the investigation complete; but he was confident the Committee would not grudge more money in order to enable the Board to prosecute its inquiries properly. He would not discuss the question of an international agreement or the extension of the three mile limit; the arguments for and against had been urged upon the Committee several times. It seemed to him that the knowledge of the facts was preliminary to everything else, and until they had that knowledge it was not much use talking about an international agreement. He therefore joined very cordially in the suggestion of several hon. Members that the Government should take up the question as a whole, and seriously consider the advisability of initiating an investigation on the largest possible basis, and of trying to get the other Powers adjoining the North Sea to co-operate. If that was done they would be in a position to go forward, and he was certain that if the result of that investigation showed that any single class of fishermen were improperly suffering, or that any particular method of fishing was doing injury, there would be no difficulty in carrying remedial measures through the House. The interest of one particular class must not be permitted to stand in the way of a national benefit, and it was from that point of view that this question must be considered.

*Major JAMESON (Clare, W.) said it was to be regretted the Government had not taken some action with regard to steam trawling. Year after year the same battle was fought, but without redress, and it was somewhat disheartening to find Scotch Members putting down such very small reductions as £10 or £100. In such a case a reduction equivalent to the whole Vote should be moved, but Scotchmen were always economical, and they were economical even in the reductions they moved. Every Irish Member was in absolute accord with the complaints which had been made by the Scotch Members, as, year by year, the fishing industries on their coasts were going out of existence, and he spoke as the representative of a constituency in Ireland who suffered cruelly from the depredations of trawlers, and who had not sufficient boats and nets to carry on their trade. Right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench were always talking about the difficulty of getting sailors and naval reserves, but was not the extermination of the fishing industries the very worst way of obviating the difficulty? He earnestly hoped the Lord Advocate, as the mouthpiece of the Government, would point out to the Secretary for Scotland that this matter must be attended to, that it could not go on year after year as it had done, and that the demands of the fishermen of Scotland must once and for all be dealt with. If the mover of the Amendment went to a division he should be most happy to support him.

Mr. POWER (Waterford, E.) thoroughly agreed with the remarks of the previous speaker, as the fishermen of Ireland were suffering tremendously from steam trawlers. Scotland very wisely some years ago prevented these trawlers coming within the three mile limit, but the result had been that a large number of those steam trawlers which had previously infested the Scotch coast now frequented the Irish coast, and were doing greater harm than in the case of Scotland. The reason they did greater harm on the Irish coasts was that the authorities had passed bye-laws prohibiting trawling within the three-mile limit, but they had no power to enforce those bye-laws against foreign trawlers. His reason for rising was to ask the Lord Advocate to be good enough to inform him in what way in Scotland they prevented the steam trawlers coming within the prescribed limits, whether they had gunboats, and, if so, how many?

Dr. CLARK said it was perfectly true these were old complaints, but they had to be repeated year after year, because nothing was done to remedy the matters complained of. In this Vote there were three items for paying the salaries of naval officers who ought to see that the law was carried out, and they had to complain that, notwithstanding the fact that they were paying this money, the law was not carried out, and the policing was inefficient. The gunboats on the Danish coast did not look upon policing work as derogatory, and the result was that the law there was carried out, and if the trawlers, when they came to the Scotch coast, met with the same reception as on the Danish coast, there would be nothing to complain of. Another evil, and one which he had not heard alluded to, was that the herring fishery was being seriously affected by the trawlers. The trawlers caught the herrings by day, and day-trawled herrings could not be properly cured, with the result that the reputation of the finest brand of herrings was being entirely ruined. That was a question affecting the right hon. Gentleman himself, because many of his own constituents were engaged in fishing for herrings, and therefore he trusted the Fishery Board would take some steps in the matter.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire) desired to say a word in regard to the trawlers which were continually coming up from the south of England to many of the beds on the south-west of Scotland. Several hon. Members appeared to be of the opinion that these trawlers did no harm whatever, but when it was found the number of fish was seriously diminishing there must be some reason for it. It was admitted on all hands that during recent years there had been great improvements in the modes of catching fish, the manipulation of the nets, and so on. If that was the case, and yet at the same time the supply of fish was so enormously diminishing, some very substantial reason must exist, and it was a matter the Government should take into very serious consideration. He was quite at one with those who thought an inquiry should be set on foot. He would go further and say that not only ought a Departmental inquiry to be made, but a Commission should be established to consider all the many questions affecting the fisheries on the coasts and also the inland fisheries of the country. He was very anxious to hear from the Lord Advocate what measures were being adopted by the Government, what effect the recent important decision of the House of Lords was likely to have, and whether or not the number of gunboats on the coast of Scotland was to be increased.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, who initiated this debate, complained that he was tired of talking so often on these old subjects and of bringing up the old grievances, and that complaint was reiterated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen, who went so far as to say that he thought a phonograph might supply sufficient occupation for the evening and save us the trouble of debating the question. In one sense, I do not know that we have ever had so satisfactory a debate as that of to-night, because, although in other years hon. Members have joined in a common abuse of the Fishery Board, which has not been altogether absent on this occasion, it has never been made so clear that although they are all anxious to provide some remedy they are really blaming the Fishery Board for precisely opposite reasons. We have really never had such a contrast between those who advocate the claims of the trawlers on the one hand and the claims of the line fishermen on the other, as we have had to-night. The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, however, began with making a quotation from a speech of the President of the Board of Trade, which, taken by itself, I think is capable of being grossly misunderstood. The hon. Member said he need not do anything more to show the serious condition the fisheries were in than to quote a sentence of my right hon. friend which he used in introducing the Bill at present before the House for dealing with sea fisheries—

> "That our fishery grounds are being depleted year by year by the operation of the trawl."

Hearing that sentence as the hon. Member used it to-night, I cannot help thinking the Committee would be led to understand that that would imply the unlawful navigation of trawlers in forbidden waters. What I want to point out is that my right hon. friend used that sentence in regard to the well-known beds in the North Sea, not territorial waters at all, but on the other side, on the coasts of Norway and Germany. Whatever we may be able to do for the policing of the fisheries, it is obvious that none of our operations would have any effect on what was being done on those fishery beds. The complaints by the hon. Member really come back to the old and familiar complaints, ineffectiveness of sea-policing, and not having entered into an international agreement. The attack naturally developed in the course of the debate, but in rather a curious way, as is shown by the speeches of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, who opened the debate, and the hon. Member for the Lowestoft Division of Suffolk. Both hon. Members made use of the same phrase in reference to the Moray Firth. Both said that the position of the Moray Firth was a scandal; but what does that mean? The hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire says it is a scandal because the foreign trawlers are not kept out. The hon. Member for Lowestoft says it is a scandal because the British trawlers are not let in. So that though they are unanimous in saying it is a scandal, when they came to apply the remedy it would be the opposite in the one case to what it would be in the other. That was the beginning of the controversy, and as I have said it developed until, I think, we have never had such an outspoken debate by those who, on the one hand, favour the trawlers and those who do not. Hon. Members from Ireland who are indirectly interested in this question take the same line as the hon. Member for Lowestoft, and the hon. Member who addressed us to-night spoke in favour of the admission of foreign trawlers. With regard to the inefficiency of sea policing, I deny that there has been any inefficiency. I do not mean to say that we have arrived at such a state of perfection that the law is never broken. Consider what it means: we have not only to protect the Moray Firth, but the three-mile limit all round Scotland, and when you come to think of the difficulty of locating a trespass where you cannot go by boundaries as on dry land, but only by an imaginary line, and that you have not only to do this by daylight, but also at night, it is not difficult to realise that where there is a disposition to break the law, the law should be contravened. But speaking on the whole no one could read the Reports of the Fishery Board without coming to the conclusion that the policing of the sea has been active, strenuous, and effective. The particulars as to the policing will be found on the thirtieth and following pages of the Report of the Fishery Board of the general Report. I might incidentally, here, answer the question put to me by the hon. Member for West Kerry. The vessels that are engaged in this work are, first of all, three regular Fishery cruisers; that is to say vessels which are the property of, and are at the disposal of, the Fishery Board of Scotland. Those are helped by the "Jackal," which is constantly used in the service, and by the "Cockchafer" and "Redwing." So that the Fishery Board have the continual service of three ships of their own and three ships of the Admiralty, which are engaged in this service. As a consequence there have been seventeen prosecutions during the past year against trawlers. And the way those prosecutions were handled is sufficiently shown by the fact that in every one the authorities were successful in obtaining a conviction, a statement which in my opinion reflects great credit on the police boats and the various officials in Scotland who had the conduct of the prosecutions. In addition to those there were a great many cases in which there were no prosecutions; but in order to show how much on the alert they were there is a table in the appendix which shows the number of various boats that were detained during the year until fishing delinquencies of one sort or another were entered into. That table shows a grand total of 646 boats which were detained pending inquiries. I honestly think when these particulars are looked into it really is not the case to say that the policy has not been effective and thorough. No doubt as long as the world lasts and the fishing industry goes on as it does, complaints will be made, and I expect them to be made, but I really do not think any complaint can be made against the Fishery Board on this matter. I may say that this fleet is shortly to be strengthened by another cruiser, which it is hoped will be ready by December next. There has been a change of policy in this matter, and instead of being dependent on the Admiralty as heretofore the Fishery Board now have their own cruisers. I might say incidentally that the complaint of the hon. Members for Ireland that the trawlers descended on the Irish coast is a back-handed compliment to the policing of the waters of Scotland, because it simply means that it is very much easier to trawl off Ireland, where the policing is non-effective, than off the coast of Scotland. With regard to the details asked for by the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, who was exceedingly sarcastic as to the efficiency of the Secretary for Scotland in not having given the details asked for, which were a return of all trawlers seen on forbidden ground, I may say those details could not be given because it would necessitate going over the logs of the whole of the fishing boats.

*MR. WEIR: It was given in the previous year by the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: And I may say the hon. Gentleman has not the right to have given to him everything he asks for. The question is whether it would be right to put all the trouble and expense of time upon the officers not only of the Fishery Board, but of the Navy, of making a Return, the result of which would not, so far as I can see, put the matter any further forward. I pass from that to what I think is the only other complaint of the hon. Member, and that is the neglect to push forward an international agreement. With regard to an international agreement, I think we are now furnished with greater knowledge and more scientific information and statistics than we enjoyed before. Her Majesty's Government have been very anxious to bring the powers together, but that is a question of very grave difficulty, and one which it is impossible for any Government to work out very rapidly. I confess that evidence is very rapidly accumulating of the decrease in the supply of fish. We have had a very halcyon speech from the hon. Member opposite, who assures us that if everybody was to eat nothing but fish it would not diminish the great supplies in the seas. That may be true, but you might as well tell a man in the middle of a desert that there was more water in the world than he could drink. The question is, how are you to get the fish out of the sea? I cannot help coming to the conclusion that unfortunately there has been a very great diminution in the fish supply. Without going for a moment into the question as to how that is caused, that it is so is shown by the fact that in order to maintain the same catch of fish as formerly not only have the boats had to go a great deal further out to sea, but the catching power of the whole combined fleet is very much greater than it used to be. That there has been a diminution in the supply is shown by the consideration of the statistics; but if anyone doubts the statement, let him ask any fishermen on any part of the coast, and they will tell the same story in regard to the diminution of the supplies near at hand. Undoubtedly something must be done in the matter if the depopulation of the seas is to be arrested, and I am quite sure that Her Majesty's Government or any other Government will have the very greatest incentive to press forward so far as they can an international agreement and co-operation in this matter. Speaking for the Fishery Board, I am sure that it will never be urged against us that we have not continued to throw our whole weight into the scale in favour of such a measure as I have indicated. In regard to the criticism of the policy of this Fishery Board I am bound to say, after all, that I do not think I have very much to meet. There are, perhaps, one or two points upon which I ought to say a word. Several hon. Members have drawn attention to the fact that there is an unfortunate depopulation going on in many of the smaller fishing villages. No doubt some hon. Members look upon that as another evidence of the deleterious effect of trawling. I do not wish to raise that controversy, but I would again call the attention of hon. Members to what appears in the Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland, a Report which I venture to say will repay perusal by anyone, and which I think reflects the greatest credit on the Department which has issued it. In that Report the Board call attention to two facts; first of all, that this year has been a year in which there has been an enormous increase in the results of trawling as against the results of line fishing. The figures have practically been inverted. Up to the present the total catch of line fishermen —who, of course, are a great deal more numerous than the other—has always been ahead of that of the trawlers, but this is no longer the case. And more than this, the average price obtained by the trawlers is very much larger than the average price obtained by the line fishermen. Then there is the fact which is clearly brought out now, that the small fisherman is more and more going to the wall; and accordingly you have at least one very obvious economic reason for this depopulation—namely, that it really no longer pays so well to fish in small places, where, firstly, the harbours are not of sufficient size or depth to accommodate the size of the boat so as to make it profitable; and secondly, there is no ready market for the fish when it is landed. The whole tendency of the fishing trade is to employ larger and larger boats, and consequently there has been latterly a tendency to centralisation, a tendency which the Fishery Board, like other people, very much deplore in the interests of the population, but which I must confess—as will be seen from a perusal of the Report—is the inevitable result of the way in which fishing is being carried on. This matter, I think, is very cognate to what was said about harbours. Of course it would be possible in one sense to keep these fishermen at home if there were harbours that would accommodate larger boats; but the Fishery Board say, and I think it is a sentiment which everyone must give assent to, that—

"It is somewhat unfortunate that the tendency to centralisation in the fishing industry is growing so rapidly. The village piers and harbours are also quite unsuitable for the large boats now in use for fishing—the depth of water being too little for entry at all states of the tide, and the shelter afforded from heavy weather quite inadequate. It is difficult to see what remedy is to be found for this state of matters, as it can hardly be expected that each little fishing community is to be provided with a deep-water harbour, and the market accommodation and railway facilities provided at the larger centres, where the revenue derived from the industry is so considerable."

That seems a hard fact, which, however much we may regret it, we cannot get over. In regard to the harbours, I think that is really the answer to some of the complaints of the hon. Member for Ross. The amount of money which the Fishery Board has at its disposal for this purpose is limited to £3,000 this year, and that has to go, in one sense, all over Scotland. The hon. Member for Ross asks, "Why not have a harbour at Portnagurran?" A harbour there would cost £30,000, whereas the Fishery Board are only allowed £3,000 for the whole of Scotland. The hon. Member for Kincardineshire deprecated the spending of money on the smaller harbours; but, after all, all the Fishery Board are able to do is to hold an even balance between the claims of the various portions of the coast, and it is obvious that it is only possible to make small harbours, and not large harbours of refuge like those asked for by the hon. Member for Ross. The only other topic on which I should say something is that of scientific investigation. It has been pointed out that the Fishery Board of Scotland has at least this feather in its cap, that it is really the only Government Department which is doing any work of this kind in the United Kingdom. Hon. Members will find from the Report that we have done very effective work in this direction, considering the limited means at our disposal. The hon. Member for Forfarshire said he would like the results compared with results elsewhere, but I do not see how that is possible while there are no Government Departments elsewhere doing the same work; and although that may be a proper thing to do in the future, it cannot be done at present. The hon. Member also spoke about the Moray Firth. Of course it is quite obvious, without going into the Moray Firth controversy, that for purposes of scientific investigation, what has happened there destroys the usefulness of that place as a spot where accurate scientific investigations can be carried on. Here again I can scarcely agree with the hon. Member for Aberdeen that the reason why Moray Firth was closed was on account of scientific investigations. I think it will be admitted that there was a general consensus of opinion among the fishing population that immature fish were caught in the Moray Firth through the operation of trawling. The hon. Member for Ross wanted to know where the office was. I think he will find the office at Aberdeen, but I do not suppose he has looked there. I think I have now dealt with all the matters of general importance, and the only thing that remains for me to do is to answer the point raised by the hon. Member for Clackmannan. The hon. Member for Clackmannan asked me what would be the result of a recent decision in the House of Lords. It is not usual on the estimates to deliver legal opinions, but I am perfectly willing to answer the hon. Member to the best of my ability. The case decided in the House of Lords the other day would, according to my humble judgment, strike at the hang nets or drift nets in the River Forth, and in point of fact there is no doubt that the decision of the House of Lords overturns the decision of the Court of Session some years ago, which held that these particular nets were according to law. As regards stake nets I do not think I can give the hon Member any useful reply. They have always been illegal in fresh water, but not illegal in the sea, and of course I do not know what particular stake nets he had in view. With regard to the questions of the hon. Baronet the Member for West Kerry, he asked what the cruisers cost. They were built some years ago, and I do not at this moment remember the figures, but I will furnish them to the hon. Member. Then the hon. Baronet asked out of what funds they were built. The "Jackal" was an Admiralty vessel, and, with regard to the others, for two years a sum was put down on a general estimate sufficient to build a cruiser. A few years ago this amount was taken out of the Vote and £15,000 was given out of one of the local funds.

which did not appear on the Estimates, but appeared in the Local Taxation Account, and in return for that the sea policing has been taken over by the Fishery Board. Then the hon. Baronet asked me about the herring brand. The history of the herring brand is rather a curious one. It originally had its origin in the bounty system, but although it was given as a bounty it very rapidly came about that the brand was of immense value in selling the herrings, and consequently when the bounty was abolished all the fishing trade prayed that the brand might nevertheless be continued, as it was looked upon as a certificate of value. Accordingly it was continued, and a bargain was made with the treasurer by which fees are charged for the branding operation, and any balance there is goes to the Fishery Board. Then the hon. Baronet asked was there any good result? I have already shown him that in what I have already said, and if he will read Part 1 of the Report of the Scotch Fishery Board for this year he will find full particulars on the subject. As a matter of fact the price obtained for Scotch herrings during the past year has been greater than ever before, partly owing to the very good fishing and partly owing to the failure of the herring supply in other parts of the world. I think these are all the points that have been raised.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I only wish to thank the Lord Advocate for his courtesy in answering my questions and for the interesting information he has given, which will be of considerable value to fishermen in Ireland.

*MR. WEIR said he complained that the money which ought to be spent on piers and harbours was being hoarded up. In his own constituency, where there were a great number of fishermen and many fishing villages, not a single penny had been expended. He referred the Lord Advocate to the pier at Avoch, on the east coast of Ross, which was destroyed by a gale some time ago, and he asked whether steps would be taken to bring the matter before the Fishery Board for Scotland in order that the pier might be put in a proper condition for boats. The right hon. Gentleman stated that large boats were now required, and he asked that the piers should be made suitable to receive them. Were the fishing villages of Scotland to be allowed to perish because the piers and harbours would not be rendered suitable for large boats? A Committee appointed by a Conservative Government recommended that a harbour of refuge should be established at Portnagurran (Island of Lewis), and he hoped that the Scotch Office would obtain the money to carry out that valuable recommendation. The right hon. Gentleman also referred to the fact that two of the Admiralty cruisers were not under the control of the Fishery Board for Scotland, and he should like to know why £100 a year was paid to the commander of one of these cruisers and £76 to the other. If the Scotch Fishery Board had no control over them, why should that money be paid? If they received the money from the Board the commanders should carry out the instructions of the Board; otherwise the whole thing was a fraud and a sham. The information he had asked for with reference to the number of days foreign trawlers fished in the Moray Firth could be obtained in a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes if the books had been properly kept, and yet he was informed that it would entail too much work. He was one of those who was most careful in his questions and most careful that they should be of a reasonable and not of an inquisitive character and merely intended to waste time. Surely when fair, honest, and reasonable questions of that kind were put they ought to be fairly and honestly answered.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The best answer to the hon. Member when he states that no money was spent in his constituency is that since 1883 out of £3,000 a year his constituents have had nearly £14,000.

*MR. BUCHANAN: I moved a reduction of this Vote in the evening, and I must now take a division, because I gather from the Lord Advocate's speech that during the five years the Government have been in office no steps have been taken to secure an international agreement with reference to fisheries in the North Sea.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

3. £3,221, to complete the sum for Lunacy Commission, Scotland.

4. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,743, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Department of the Registrar General of Births, etc., in Scotland."

*MR. WEIR said he found from the Report of the Registrar General that a large proportion of the deaths in the Highlands had not been certified by the medical officers. That was a state of affairs which should not be allowed to continue. The returns should show the numbers of deaths which were certified and the number of deaths which were not certified. The Department appeared to be conducted on a very slovenly method, and he did not know what the Registrar General was about to allow such a state of affairs to continue. Surely it would be easy to add a column giving the required information. He would ask for information with reference to the sum of £750 for appropriation in aid. On page 180 there was a sum of £350 for a senior clerk, and it was stated that the senior clerk was also interim keeper of the Register of Entails, and one of the second division clerks was clerk of entails. For recording in that register, not during the general Registry Office hours, the two clerks mentioned received last year fees amounting to £35 16s. 5d. and 15s. 8d. respectively. Why was the system adopted of allowing clerks to conduct public business after general office hours? The system did not prevail in England, and was an unsound principle. He hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to give information which would enable the Vote to be taken without a division.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: I would wish to say a word in support of the first proposition of my hon. friend. The point he called attention to is a very important one, and is of pressing importance in the case of Scotland. Seven years ago I obtained a Select Committee to inquire into the certification of deaths, which was presided over by the President of the Local Government Board. It drew up a number of recommendations, not one of which has been given effect to. In some of the western parts of Scotland it was found that as many as 50 per cent. of the deaths were uncertified by medical men. That is a very flagrant scandal, and it would certainly do something to impress the public mind with the importance of the subject if such facts as that were stated in the Registrar General's Report. There is nothing easier than to give full information in the matter, and I trust that the Lord Advocate will bring his influence to bear on the Registrar General to have that very important and easily-procurable information included in his Report.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: With regard to the certification of deaths, I do not know that there is anything more to be said than was stated in the Report of the Committee to which the hon. Baronet referred.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: What I ask is that we should in future have in the Report of the Registrar General a record of the number of deaths which were uncertified.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty has called attention to the fact that senior clerks in the Register of Entails were paid certain fees in addition to their salaries. I fail to see anything wrong in that The hon. Member knows that in the Register House are kept the Register of Sasines, the Register of Entails, and many others, and it is found convenient that the clerks should be allowed to be paid extra for extra work. This was done under the supervision of the Registrar of Entails, and the whole work of the Register House is under the supervision of the Registrar General.

*MR. WEIR said he did not object to that. What he objected to was that a public Department should be kept open after office hours, with all the attendants hanging about, in order that these two clerks might carry on work for their own profit. It seemed to him that the fees should go into the Public Treasury. He thought it unjust that these clerks, who received a salary for their own work, should take the bread out of another's mouth by doing extra work and getting paid for it in the shape of fees. The system was a thoroughly unsound one, and he was amazed that the Lord Advocate supported it. As to the registration of deaths he thought it would be the simplest thing in the world to have another column in the table showing what deaths were certified, and what were not certified. The Lord Advocate's reply was not satisfactory, since he gave no promise that this state of matters would be altered. In his own constituency there were hundreds of deaths uncertified every year, which he considered a disgrace to any civilised country. As a protest he moved that the Vote be reduced by £50.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,693, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Weir.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £8,508, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Local Government Board for Scotland, and for Expenses under the Vaccination Act, Infectious Disease Notification Act, Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1894, Public Health (Scotland) Act, Poor Law (Scotland) Act, and Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899."

SIR CHARLES CAMERON said that when the Vaccination Act for England was passed two or three years ago he had asked the Lord Advocate whether it was the intention of the Government to extend the Act to Scotland. From the Report of the Local Government Board for Scotland he found that the proportion of calf lymph distributed to the public vaccinators in Scotland was small compared with infant lymph. Last year there were only 692 tubes of calf lymph for vaccination, against 2,000 tubes of infant lymph. He asked, had any steps been taken to assimilate the practice in Scotland with that in England, and why was it that calf's lymph had not been more extensively introduced into Scotland? His principal purpose, however, in rising was to draw attention to a matter connected with Quarrier's Orphan Homes at Bridge of Weir, Renfrewshire. In these orphan homes there were upwards of 1,000 waifs and strays taken from the streets and gathered from different parts of the country. The homes were supported by voluntary contributions, and conducted on a system organised by Mr. Quarrier, which had been so successful that a Departmental Committee reported that the results among the children had been infinitely more encouraging and satisfactory than amongst the children sent to industrial schools. Until comparatively recently, an agreement existed between the local authorities and Mr. Quarrier that the homes should be exempted from rates, on his undertaking at his own expense the education of the children and their treatment when sick. Some time ago an action was raised, the result of which was that it was declared to be illegal to exempt Mr. Quarrier's homes from the local rates. Mr. Quarrier then said that if he was going to pay the rates he would claim his privileges as a citizen, and demand from the educational authorities that free education for the children in his homes to which every child in Scotland was entitled, and also the privileges for the children given by the sanitation laws. He could not go into the educational part of the question on this Vote, but only the sanitary. At the time when this attitude was taken by Mr. Quarrier on the one hand, and the local authorities on the other, Mr. Quarrier insisted on getting his children educated at the public schools and treated in the public hospitals of the sanitary authority. The School Board refused to take the children in the public schools, but the sanitary authority received some of them into their hospitals. Since then things had become more acute. On the occasion of a recent epidemic of scarlet fever, a number of children in these homes were attacked, and Mr. Quarrier called upon the local authority to remove them and put them into the infectious diseases hospital. The local authority took one or two of the children and no more. Mr. Quarrier appealed to the Local Government Board, which, after some correspondence, suggested some means of getting out of the difficulty. He believed, however, that nothing had yet been done, and there was in the meantime this state of matters, that if an epidemic of scarlatina or measles broke out in the midst of this large number of children there was no machinery for removing the sick children to a place where they would cease to be a source of danger. It seemed to him that it was the duty of the Local Government Board to have regard to public health, and to have nothing to do with the quarrel between Mr. Quarrier and the local authority. A child of Mr. Quarrier was entitled to all the attention given to any other sick child at the hands of the sanitary authority. It was not conducive to the public health that, in the case of an epidemic, any large body of children should be allowed to become a source of danger to the children of the village and of the entire country. It was the duty of the Local Government Board to amend things of that sort, and they should insist in that being done in a manner competent to them. If the right hon. Gentleman thought that a person in charge of such an institution should be compelled by law to provide accommodation for such cases, let there be legislation for that purpose, but in the meantime no such legislation existed. The law laid it down that the sanitary authority of a district should be responsible for checking these infectious diseases, and the Local Government Board had already recognised their duty in the matter. He saw from their Report that in the case of Ayr, where no sufficient accommodation had been provided, they stepped in and insisted that it should be provided. The case had been taken to the Court of Session, where it was held that the Local Government Board was supreme in the matter, and could insist on the extension of the hospital for infectious diseases, and an hospital for that purpose was accordingly built at Ayr. In another case in connection with a combination hospital, it was laid down that accommodation must be afforded so long as there was any case requiring attention, and that when the accommodation was exhausted it was the duty of the Local Government Board to call on the local authority to provide accommodation. The accommodation at Bridge of Weir was exhausted, or threatened to be exhausted, and an appeal was made to the Local Government Board; but nothing had yet been done to increase it. These epidemics were constantly breaking out, and if another occurred it was sure to spread among the children in the homes, and they would become a source of danger to the children of the town and the surrounding districts. That was most unsatisfactory, and it was the duty of the Local Government Board, as the central authority, to insist that a state of things which constituted so grave a public danger should no longer obtain. The Local Government Board had in this matter been negligent of its duties. It had failed to step in with a firm hand and exercise its powers for the public good, and had allowed matters to drift in a contrary direction. He moved the reduction of the Vote by £200.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £8,308 be granted for the said Service."—(Sir Charles Cameron.)

*MR. WEIR said that the Local Government Board were responsible for looking after the public health in Scotland. He held in his hand the annual Report of the public health officer for Ross and Cromarty, who was a member of the Medical Council in London, and well qualified to deal with the subject of public health. The report was of such a character that he felt bound to direct attention to it. It stated that there were wells on the Island of Lewis totally unprotected, that there was no hospital for infectious diseases, except at Stornoway, and that the expense had prevented the local authorities from building isolation and other hospitals. In 1899 there were four cases of diphtheria on the Island of Lewis, against three on the mainland; 189 cases of scarlatina against ninety-seven, and eighteen cases of typhoid against fifteen, whereas the proportion of population was only as three to seven. And yet the Local Government Board would not take any steps to bring about a better state of matters. It was marvellous how any person could escape contagion on the Island of Lewis. The Report mentioned one case in which a mother was in bed with fever, while three children were lying on the floor covered only by the rags provided by the doctor. In a village with a population of little more than 300 there were forty-one cases of typhoid fever in six months. The ratepayers could do nothing, and it was a case for the Local Government Board to take action in order to put an end to such a terrible state of affairs. It went on year after year, and yet no action was taken to relieve the deplorable condition of the people on the Island of Lewis. 30,000 people were living in a congested area in most unsanitary dwellings, and no steps whatever were taken to improve their condition. Of course it would be a very serious state of things to turn these poor people out of their homes, but still the Local Government Board ought to attempt something in order to bring about a better condition of affairs. The Island of Harris was in a similar condition, as were also some of the islands off the coast of Inverness. The neglect displayed by the Local Government Board was not confined to the islands of Lewis and Harris, but extended right through the islands of the Outer Hebrides. He should like to know why the inspectors of the Local Government Board were Army men who were pitchforked into these positions. What did they know about diseases like typhoid? Absolutely nothing. The medical officer of health described the dwellings in one of the districts of Ross as in a shocking condition, a standing danger to the public health, and an outrage against all laws of sanitation. In that district forty-one cases of typhoid occurred in an area of a few hundred yards. There were no skilled nurses, and not an hospital nearer than Stornoway, sixteen miles distant. It was absolutely impossible for the poor people to provide suitable isolation hospitals for such cases. The medical officer of health stated that during the prevalence of the fever the children were excluded from school, to their own loss as well as to the loss of the teachers, and that the men were not allowed to attend their annual drill. He would not weary the Committee by further describing the sad state of affairs which existed in that part of Scotland. He felt it was his duty as its representative to bring the matter before the Committee, in order to show the gross neglect and indifference displayed by the Local Government Board in attending to its duties, and in administering the laws passed by Parliament in the interests of the public health. He had visited the huts of the negroes in Africa, and he could say they were better than the crofters' cottages in some parts of the Highlands. And yet the Scottish Office declined to afford these poor people any assistance except on utterly impossible conditions. He considered it was the duty of the Local Government Board to look into these matters. The Vice-President received a salary of £1,200, and the legal and medical members £1,000 each, and there were besides a number of inspectors, chiefly Army men, one of whom was paid 7s. a day out of Army funds. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to see that the Local Government Board paid some attention to the state of affairs described by the medical officer of health for Ross. He was a well known and distinguished man, and a member of the General Medical Council, and his opinions were entitled to respect. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give him a satisfactory reply.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) said that with reference to the Quarrier Homes which had been mentioned by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Bridgeton Division, every practical man knew the benefits they conferred, and that they enjoyed the confidence and support of the people of Scotland to a very great extent. He was glad to have an opportunity of supporting the hon. Baronet, and he would feel bound to vote with him unless a satisfactory reply were given by the Lord Advocate.

*MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston) said he should also like to support the hon. Baronet and his hon. friend the Member for the Falkirk Burghs. There was a very strong feeling in the West of Scotland that a very grave injustice had been done to the institution mentioned by its being compelled to pay rates, while being deprived of the benefits derived from their expenditure, and he hoped the Lord Advocate would be able to give a satisfactory reply.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The first question put to me by the hon. Baronet had reference to glycerinated lymph. My answer is that up to the present perhaps the advantages of glycerinated lymph in vaccination have scarcely been brought home so clearly to the people of Scotland as to the people of England, but I am glad to say that the demand for the lymph from the Local Government Board of Scotland is steadily increasing. The hon. Baronet may rest assured that the public demand for the lymph will go on growing, and we have made provision for that in the Estimates. With reference to the question of Quarrier's Homes, if I had known that it was to be raised, I would have brought down the correspondence. I must say in answer to the speech last delivered that the matter should not be confounded with the different question which will arise on the Education Vote, but I would not be in order in referring to that now. I can only deal at present with the question concerning infectious diseases. As a matter of fact, the Local Government Board have not been supine in this matter, nor have they refused the same benefits to the homes that other people have. The Local Government Board under the powers conferred on them under Section 66 of the Public Health Act of 1897 called on the local authority to take the necessary action, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that nothing more could have been done up to the present. The hon. Baronet says that nothing has happened since.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: This is no new matter. When there were seven or eight cases of fever the local authorities were called on to remove them, and they refused. The Local Government Board were appealed to, and they stated that nothing further had been done in the matter.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: The hon. Baronet will remember the answer I gave to the question he himself put. The next step that can be taken by the Local Government Board is to apply to the courts, and, so far as I know, that has not been done up to the present. I am sorry I am unable to give any further particulars, because I had no notice that this question would be raised on this Vote. But the hon. Baronet may be quite satisfied that the Local Government Board will mete out the same measure in this case as is meted out in all other cases. With regard to the questions of the hon. Member for Ross, he, as usual, used very strong and very general language with regard to the supineness, sluggishness, and general uselessness of the Local Government Board. The hon. Member has, however, scarcely reflected on the difficulty of providing for the accommodation to which he referred. It would be a very difficult, or rather I should say an impossible, task. I must honestly confess I cannot understand what the hon. Member means when he reads extracts from the report of a medical officer of health to that effect, and it is perfectly impossible to throw on the ratepayers the cost of providing hospital accommodation such as a medical man might wish. The hon. Member seems to think that the Local Government Board have some fund at their command which would enable the Local Government Board to step in and provide hospital accommodation where the ratepayers were unable to supply it themselves. There is no such fund, and all the Local Government Board can do is to make the local authorities do their duty in such matters.

*MR. WEIR said that the statements were not his, but those of a distinguished member of the medical profession.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: That does not help the argument of the hon. Member. The hon. Member also delivered some remarks on the personnel of the inspectors of the Local Government Board. He said they were mainly Army men, but I do not think that one of the present inspectors has ever been connected with the Army. The hon. Member referred in particular to one gentleman, but he is no longer an inspector of the Local Government Board, and his successor is not an Army man. The suggestion that the inspectors should be medical men is not a suggestion that would be received with favour. The Local Government Board have to perform other duties besides medical duties, and the latter are at present looked after by the medical members of the Board.

IRISH LAND LEGISLATION—FRY COMMISSION REPORT.

*LORD CLONBROCK: My Lords, in rising to put the question which stands in my name—namely, "To ask Her Majesty's Government whether any (and if so, what) recommendations of the Fry Commission will be carried into effect in addition to those already adopted; and what are the principal recommendations of that Commission which cannot be carried into effect without fresh legislation"—I think it advisable to explain my reason for the second part of that question. Recently, in the House of Commons, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, in replying to a similar question to the first part of mine, asked whether it was wished to reopen the whole question of land legislation. It would naturally be inferred from this that the adoption of all the recommendations, of any importance, of the Commission presided over by Sir E. Fry would require fresh legislation. Now, my Lords, speaking on behalf of Irish landlords, I may say that we believe that a considerable number of those recommendations, which would introduce a marked improvement into the administration of the Land Acts, could be carried into effect without any legislation whatever. I have given a list of them to my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, but I hope I may be permitted to explain some of them to the House, and point out the advantages to be gained by adopting them. In the first place, my Lords, the Fry Commission Report points out that the assistant commissioners and valuers have never been furnished with any definition of what constitutes the fair rent which they are directed to fix. It seems to have surprised the Commissioners that this had not been done, or that any judicial exposition had not been given of what they term "the two weightiest words in the whole statute"—"fair rent"—during more than sixteen years; but it seems still more surprising that, after the defect had been pointed out by such a body as the Royal Commission, no steps should in the last three years have been taken to remedy it. The Report recommends, as a definition of the gross fair rent—

> "The annual sum at which, after all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district have been taken into consideration, the holding in the landlord's hands might reasonably be expected to let from year to year to a solvent and prudent tenant who desired to derive a benefit from the occupation of the tenement, and not from its sale."

This assumption that the holding was in the landlord's hands was not altogether foreign to the Land Commission in its early days, for in a letter addressed by their secretary to one of their valuers (Mr. G. C. Grey), and printed in a Paper laid before Parliament in 1882, the valuer is directed to give his opinion—

> "of the present fair letting value of each holding . . . on the assumption that the holding is now in the hands of the landlord and now to be let."

In pressing this recommendation we only, therefore, ask that they should give as a general direction to all assistant commissioners and valuers what they gave in this particular instance to Mr. Grey. I now come, my Lords, to the recommendations of the Report as to Amendments in the Pink Schedule, in which the assistant commissioners give particulars of the holding of which they fix the rent. They recommend that the annual value should be stated in accordance with the definition which I have given of gross fair rent, so as to negative the tendency to allow for occupation interest. They further recommend that particulars of improvements should be more fully stated than at present, and that where an annual sum is allowed particulars should be given to show whether the charge is permanent, or is to terminate at any definite time. I need not point out to your Lordships the importance and the fairness of these suggestions. In a Pink Schedule, for instance, which I have here, 100 perches of fences are specified and 5 per cent. allowed to the tenant on the capital value; but there is no description of what the fences are or where they are situated on the farm. We wish to submit that their nature should be stated, and their position laid down on the large-sized ordnance map (where procurable) and that map appended to the schedule. As regards the permanence of improvements, I would refer your Lordships to the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883, with which many of your Lordships are doubtless familiar. In Section 19, sub-section (d) it is laid down that the award shall specify—

> "Where the landlord desires to charge his estate with the amount of compensation found due to the tenant, the time at which, for the purposes of such charge, each improvement, act, or thing in respect of which compensation is awarded, is to be deemed to be exhausted."

We submit that the precaution thus taken in this country to prevent a landlord from being charged for an exhausted improvement should be adopted in the Pink Schedule. At present there is nothing to show that a landlord may not be charged 5 per cent. for ever for an exhausted improvement, and great confusion may arise. My Lords, too much precaution cannot be taken to prevent such future confusion. The case to which this Pink Schedule refers is a remarkable one in another respect. I will not give the names of the parties, or go thoroughly into it, as I am informed the decision will be appealed against. But I may state shortly that, at the first fixing of the rent in 1883, the dwelling-house was pronounced to be the property of the landlord, and a schedule (not in the present form) furnished to him by the Court to that effect. At the second fixing of rent, the assistant commissioners refused that schedule as evidence, and called on him to prove his case again. He had difficulties in doing so, owing to a change of agents, and they gave the house to the tenant. This decision may be reversed on appeal, but I would urge that there should be no necessity for appeal in such a case—that the decision of the Court should be placed on record, and should not subsequently be questioned. There is another point, my Lords, which has only quite lately been suggested to me, and which, although it is not mentioned in the Report of the Fry Commission, is worthy of notice. It is the custom of the Land Commission in the Court tests which are given to the parties concerned, and used by themselves, to describe the rents fixed for the first time as "old rents." Now, in ordinary parlance, "old rents" are the rents payable before the operation of the Land Act of 1881, and by describing the rents fixed for the first term as old rents, the total reduction is made to appear less than it has in reality been. For if a rent has been reduced, say 20 per cent. on the first term, and again 20 per cent. on the second, the total reduction is 40 per cent. from the old rent—whereas by describing the first judicial rent as "old rent" it only appears to be 20 per cent. I would now call the attention of the Government to the recommendations respecting Court valuers, who are appointed by the Land Commission when an application is made for rehearing a case which has been dealt with by the assistant commissioners. The Report recommends that they should constitute a separate body or list of officials, that they ought to be furnished not with the Pink Schedule, as the practice is, but only with the map and description of the property, and that their report should be made in ignorance of the finding below. Further, that they should attend the court, and act as assessors to the Land Commission, and be liable to be examined by them. To these recommendations, my Lords, we attach very great importance. It would take far too long to read to your Lordships all that the Report says on the subject, but I may say that it fully confirms the view which we have always maintained, that under the present system the decision of the court of rehearing is in many cases a foregone conclusion, and the proceedings therefore little better than a farce. For if the valuers are selected from among the assistant commissioners, and sent on to a farm with the Pink Schedule in their hands to review the decisions of the Subcommission it is almost impossible that they should not be biased by the previously expressed opinions of their colleagues, and often content themselves with merely registering their decision. It is therefore urgently necessary that the Pink Schedule should be withheld from the court valuers, in order that they should form an independent estimate. Nor would this be without precedent. In the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890 it is laid down in Section 27, Subsection 3, of the Second Schedule, that where the local authority is the appellant in the case of an appeal from the arbitrator to a jury—

> "The amount of compensation awarded by the arbitrator shall not be communicated to the jury, but they shall be required to make an independent assessment of the amount of compensation to which the party claiming compensation is entitled."

It seems only in accordance with sound principles that the valuers should attend the court of rehearing, and be liable to examination at least by the Commissioners. I cannot see why they should not be examined by the parties. In other Courts the most eminent valuers are subject to examination and cross-examination. And now, my Lords, as to purchase, the Report states that the Land Commission—

> "have been over strict in the matter of security, and applications to the Department have been thereby discouraged."

It recommends that the form for the inspector's report should—

"unambiguously draw the attention of the inspector to the fact that he is required to value the conjoint interests of landlord and tenant, which will be brought together in the tenant on purchase."

I commend these recommendations and others which will be found in the Report to the attention of the Government, who take so deep an interest in the purchase question. The Purchase Acts have hitherto been administered as if the interest of the tenant was the only thing to be seriously consulted. No pains have been grudged to make the conditions of purchase as tempting to the tenant as possible. On the other hand, all proposals for mitigating the loss of income and heavy costs entailed on the landlord have been dealt with in a grudging spirit. This policy has prevented many tenants from obtaining the benefits of the Acts. My Lords, I fear I have trespassed too long on the patience of the House in the statement which I have made. My excuse must be the importance of the subject, and the injuries which I believe landlords have been and are receiving from the faulty administration of the Land Acts, and the failure to adopt the recommendations of the Fry Commission. But I must add that, while I am speaking on behalf of landlords, it is not only they that are concerned. It is equally for the interest of tenants, that all rules and principles of administration should be clear, accurate, and easily intelligible; that all estimates of value should be made in a trustworthy and independent manner; and that all questions relating to sale and purchase should be conducted in a liberal spirit.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, the subject to which my noble friend has referred is one of importance, and I am not sorry that he has drawn attention to it, because the matter is so much discussed in conversation, in the press, and in literature by those who are interested, that I think it is better to have a perfectly clear understanding with regard to it. Now, my Lords, what was the Fry Commission? The Fry Commission was appointed on 10th July, 1897, and was presided over by a distinguished ex-judge, Sir Edward Fry, for whom I, and I am sure every Member of your Lordships' House, have the most entire respect. That Commission reported on 4th February, 1898. It was not for a moment suggested that the Report of that Commission was to be taken as a new gospel, that every one of the pronouncements it contained was to be taken without challenge or without question, and that all its recommendations were to be accepted in globo without criticism or observation. It is obvious, however, that the Report was one to be considered, weighed, examined, and treated with respect, with a view to giving some effect to it. The landowners have themselves declined to accept some leading statements in the Report of the Fry Commission, which had (amongst others) refused to accept the argument that the high prices that were demanded and accepted for tenant right were of themselves demonstration that the rents had been unduly reduced. A great deal of the efforts of the landowning representatives who appeared before that Commission were directed to proving and to establishing this contention, but the Fry Commission declined to accept it, and gave reasons to show that it was one which had to be regarded from several points of view and needed very close examination. I mention that merely to indicate that my noble friend and those for whom he speaks so forcibly and strongly are not themselves in a position to accept some of the strongest and clearest findings of the Fry Commission. In inquiring what is the duty of the Land Commission we must remember that the Commision is not a Government Department, and that the Government have no control over the making of their rules. The Land Commissioners, when once they are appointed by the Crown, are paid out of the Consolidated Fund, and there is no member of the Government, in touch with the making of their rules. I, as Lord Chancellor, take part, of course, in the making of the rules for the High Court and also for the county courts, but I have no voice in the making of the rules for the Land Commission. They make their own rules on their own responsibility, and exercise their own discretion, taking into consideration what they think is right and just. Now, what is the personnel of the Land Commission? The members are sometimes spoken of in terms of disparagement, as if they were doing things which were wrong and unfair, and which nobody else would do. In my opinion the members of the Land Commission are honourable gentlemen who are appointed to perform difficult and important duties, and their honour, integrity, character, capacity, and experience cannot be lightly assailed or called in question by anyone who is alive to the responsibility of his words. They are not only men of the class I have indicated, but they are presided over by a Judicial Commissioner, Mr. Justice Meredith, who is a judge of the High Court, and who, I beg leave to say, is as able, high-minded, and impartial a judge as can be found in any of the three kingdoms. That is the body who have to deal with the greater number of the recommendations of the Fry Commission, and whose actions you have to consider. If all the recommendations of the Fry Commission were not to be accepted without question, what was the duty of the Land Commission with regard to them? It was to examine for themselves honourably, fairly, and impartially the recommendations made, to adopt such of them as in their judgment appeared advisable, and not to adopt such of them as did not commend themselves to their fair judgment. The Land Commission are not responsible for the Act of 1881. If it has worked hardly on any class they are not responsible. If it is not a popular Act with any party in Ireland—and I am not prepared to say it is—the responsibility does not rest with them. They were appointed by the State to administer the Act according to their lights, guided by the obligation that devolves upon them to administer justice fairly and impartially. The Land Commission sedulously applied themselves month after month to this question, and they have adopted a great many of the recommendations of the Fry Commission which are of the very highest importance. They have adopted a rule regulating and rendering more particular and minute the inspection and reports of the court valuers. They have done what is of the highest importance in reference even to the topic spoken of to-day by my noble friend, and have taken care that the decisions of the Land Commissioners themselves and of the Court of Appeal should be circulated among the assistant commissioners so as to give them a clearer knowledge and the highest guidance with reference to their duties; and anyone acquainted with the subject must know that there is nothing so important as to keep the lower tribunals acquainted with the decisions of the law to which they are bound to conform. With regard to the reference in my noble friend's speech as to giving directions to the sub-commissioners, I have to observe that you cannot give directions to a judicial body as to how they are to decide; but you can do what is the most efficacious thing, and the thing most likely to secure equal justice being done—namely, you can take steps to keep them informed of all the most recent governing decisions upon the Land Code to which they are bound to have regard. They have also taken steps to communicate to the parties at as early a date as possible the valuer's report. This was one of the points recommended by the Fry Commission. They are taking steps every day to facilitate the communication of these important documents. Another point to which attention was directed was that of having some automatic or alternative procedure that would save the tremendous expenditure in costs, which constitute one of the great difficulties in the administration of the Land Code. The Fry Commission laid down a long and, I venture to say, a complicated and certainly difficult alternative system, which could not have been carried out without the aid of legislation; but the Land Commission, applying their own mind to the question, have themselves formulated an alternative procedure to promote simplicity and speed of decision apart from the danger and peril of high costs. That has been done, and 1,146 applications have come in under this new form. The furnishing of copies of the Pink Schedule without delay to the parties is being encouraged in every possible way. The Land Commission do everything they can to prevent delay, and they investigate every complaint that is made to them on the subject. I am informed that at the present moment they are applying themselves to perfecting the organisation of their records to prevent an hour being lost. The Fry Commission pointed out that the qualifications of the assistant commissioners were not satisfactory, and urged that these great interests of landlord and tenant should not be decided and regulated by men of whom no qualifications were required either by Act of Parliament or by rules. The Land Commission, with the aid of the Government and the Civil Service Commissioners, at once applied themselves to this question. They have laid down a system of examination which is now working, and which has applied with reference to all the appointments that have since been made. Then there is another matter to which enormous weight was attached by the very influential class represented by my noble friend, and which also attracted the attention of the Fry Commission. The practice had grown up of having only one lay sub-commissioner to act with the legal commissioner. This was deemed to be unsatisfactory. It was, however, working fairly well, and there were not many complaints. But the Fry Commission reported that on the whole they thought it would be more satisfactory to all parties if that system was dropped, and a universal rule applied of having always two lay sub-commissioners acting with the legal sub-commissioner. This recommendation was adopted after the requisite correspondence with the Government and the Treasury, and it caused the appointment of seventeen new sub-commissioners at an annual cost of something like £15,000. If that is not a test of vigour in applying the recommendations of the Fry Commission, I am at a loss to know what is. This is a slight retrospect of what has been done. My noble friend passed it by as if nothing had been accomplished, but it is obvious from the short statement I have made that a great deal has been done which is of the highest importance. My noble friend has asked why the definition of fair rent given by the Fry Commission has not been adopted? I can answer that in a very few words. The Act of 1881—the governing Act—though every syllable, comma, and semi-colon in it were debated, avoided giving a definition of "fair rent." It prescribed that the fair rent should be fixed, having regard to the interest of the landlord and the tenant, and to the circumstances of the case, holding, and district. That was the only guidance the Act of Parliament gave, and though the matter has repeatedly come before Parliament since that date, I am not aware of any effort having been made to place upon the statute book a definition of fair rent. At all events, the Act of 1881 deliberately and distinctly refrained from giving a definition. Sir Edward Fry and his colleagues formulated what they considered would be a definition that would suit all cases. I ask my noble friend's attention to that. It was not a definition to suit a casual or particular case, but one which was to suit every case under every condition in every part of Ireland. The words they used were—

> "The annual sum at which, after all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district have been taken into consideration, the holding in the landlord's hands might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, to a solvent and prudent tenant who desired to derive a benefit from the occupation of the tenement, and not from its sale."

It is obvious that the new words introduced there are "in the landlord's possession," and when this was submitted to test of the judicial examination in the Land Commission, in the case of Ripley v. Macnaughten, before Mr. Justice Meredith, who had the benefit, which the Fry Commission had not, of hearing this matter discussed in all its bearings as a legal point, Mr. Justice Meredith was unable to accept it as a judicial definition which should be applicable to all cases. He pointed out that the words "in the landlord's possession" were not found in the Act of 1881, and that the very opposite was made the foundation upon which fair rent was to be fixed, a tenant being in possession. Mr. Justice Meredith therefore declined to accept the definition, holding it to be ambiguous, and likely in many cases to lead to the assessment of a competitive value of the land, which, in his opinion, was opposed to the true meaning and purpose of the Land Act. Later on the question came before the Court of Appeal. I have the honour of presiding over that court, but I was not present on the particular occasion when the matter came up. My able colleagues, however, were there, and the point was presented in the case of Lord Gosford v. Blair. Counsel for the landlord endeavoured to present for the decision of the Court of Appeal the Fry definition of fair rent, and asked the court to determine that it was a definition that should be accepted in all cases to regulate and control the administration of the Land Laws. The Court of Appeal felt bound to say that they could not answer what was a mere abstract question, and that they could only deal with a concrete question in relation to a particular holding that was to settle a particular rent. Lord Justice Fitzgibbon said, in reference to the matter—

> "It we were to treat the question strictly according to the letter, as simply asking whether the Land Commission was bound in every case to make a false assumption of fact as the basis for determining fair rent, we might answer it at once in the negative, because the Act of 1881, Section 8 (1) prescribes no such assumption, and, on the contrary, it requires the court to fix the fair rent between two litigating parties, one of whom is necessarily in every case an occupying tenant, and it directs that regard shall be had to their respective interests, and that all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district shall be considered."

It is obvious that, after these judicial utterances, it is hardly possible now to expect the Fry Commission's definition of fair rent to be accepted as universally applicable to all cases, save under the pressure of an Act of Parliament. Another matter mentioned by my noble friend was the Pink Schedule. The Pink Schedule, in the opinion of the Land Commission, is at present overloaded, and they cannot regard it as at all desirable that they should be asked to set out any more minute details. I have been asked a question as to the permanence of the allowance for improvements. When a rent is fixed for fifteen years it is for fifteen years, and I assume that the allowance for improvements is for no less a term. The Commissioners are only dealing with the term of fifteen years, and at the end of that time, of course, the matter may have to be examined again. My noble friend referred, I think, to the action of the Land Commission in dealing with tenants who had been guilty of unreasonable conduct, and he argued that it was only right, if a tenant had been guilty of unreasonable conduct and of deteriorating the property, he should be dealt with drastically. That is the opinion of the Land Commission. Over and over again, if a tenant has been guilty of such conduct his case is adjourned, and I am informed that where a tenant is found guilty of unreasonable conduct, his case is postponed until the Commission are satisfied that the holding has been placed in a normal condition.

*LORD CLONBROCK: I did not mention that point because I know that some steps have been taken in that direction.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: I am glad to hear that the noble Lord is of opinion that tenants guilty of unreasonable conduct are adequately dealt with by the Land Commission at the present time. I will, therefore, not pursue that point further. My noble friend directed a good deal of his argument to the position of the valuers, and he held that they should be a separate body. It is true that the court valuers have the status, pay, and position of assistant commissioners, but although that is so, they are, I believe, mainly, if not always, confined to the work of valuing, and do not go backwards and forwards from one function to another. They are largely, if not altogether, bound to direct attention to the important duty of valuing; and does it not stand to reason that the higher the status and the better the tenure you give these men the more reliable will be their work? Then something was said as to their "independence." What is meant exactly by that word?

THE EARL OF MAYO: Independent of the sub-commissioners.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: Surely they are at present independent of the sub-commissioners. How could they possibly be more independent? They go down as court valuers to examine and report upon premises without previously having had communication with the parties or with the sub-commissioners, and they are independent of the sub-commissioners in every sense that can be reasonably given to that term. They are sent to examine, to report, and to give their own independent view.

*LORD CLONBROCK: The Fry Commission specially mentioned a case where the arithmetical blunders perpetrated by the assistant commissioners were reproduced in the report of the Court valuers, owing to what they themselves called the slavish copying of the report of the former officials.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: That was five or six years ago. We have lived and learned, and the sub-commissioners who are now engaged in the work of valuing are kept practically to that duty. Another point was that it was wrong for the Land Commissioners to have two valuers, and that they ought to stick to one.

*LORD CLONBROCK: I did not say so.

*LORD ASHBOURNE: I know you did not—you have too much excellent sense; but one of the points put most strenuously in one of the arguments on this question, in which the Land Commission were attacked in reference to the methods of valuation, was that they should have confined themselves to one valuer. I do not think it is necessary to say anything with regard to that point. My noble friend directed attention to the recommendation of the Fry Commission that the valuer should not be given a copy of the Pink Schedule, but should go down to make his valuation absolutely ignorant of what had happened before. This matter has been very carefully considered by the Land Commission, and they have arrived at the conclusion that it is not a proposal which commends itself to their judgment as business-men. They have not followed it, and they do not think it necessary or expedient to do so. Personally, I hardly think it is advisable, even if it were possible, to send men down to make valuations and keep them in ignorance of what has gone on before. When the matter came up for examination in the Court of Appeal, on a recent occasion, one of the Lords Justices used these words—

"So far as this objection insists upon the court valuers going de novo through the details of the work it is a mischievous objection. All valuable information should be supplied, and having regard to the nature of the reference the information as to what was previously done should be especially valuable. The whole object of the rehearing is to correct the previous conclusion on the same subject. Though the Land Commission must rehear the case and pronounce its own judgment on its own responsibility, the knowledge of what was objected to is a help and not a hindrance to a better condition. The same remark applies even more forcibly to the court valuers. Experts are more prone to differ than to agree."

The noble Lord urged that the valuers should attend and constitute part of the tribunal as assessors. That is not a matter that could be dealt with without legislation, for it would be a distinct change in the constitution of the tribunal. I now come to the question of purchase. I must remind my noble friend that at the time the Fry Commission were conducting their inquiries—1897—purchase was at rather a low ebb, possibly in consequence of the Fry Commission. People's minds were occupied with the expectations that always flow from inquiries of this kind, and great changes, it was thought, might result from the Commission. The celebrated Section 40 was then in its infancy, and the Commission gave very cautious, and I am bound to say I do not think particularly useful, suggestions with reference to purchase. One of the points most constantly pressed was that adequate attention was not directed to the fact that the valuers had to deal with a conjoint interest. I believe the Land Commission's view on that subject is that the valuers have always realised that they were dealing with a double interest. But, to prevent the possibility of any question or suggestion in the matter, the following note has been added to the instructions to valuers—

"N.B.—In answering this query the inspector must have regard to the fact that if the advance is made the security will embrace the consolidated interests of the landlord and the tenant in the holding."

That, I think, prevents the possibility of any doubt and obscurity. Though I am not going into statistics, I would like to say that the purchase system is working in a perfectly satisfactory way. It will be a pleasure to the noble Duke, the Duke of Abercorn, who has always taken an interest in the working of the Code, to know that even Section 40 of the Act of 1896 is working reasonably, fairly, vigorously, and hopefully. The purchase transactions this year have amounted to about £1,500,000. In 1897 the number of applications to the Commission were 2,787, but during the past year they have reached the great number of 6,911. Surely it is impossible to explain away these figures. The purchase system is undoubtedly working vigorously and hopefully, and in a way which I venture to think gives ground for the expectation that it will continue to grow and prosper. I am sorry that I have had to occupy so much of your Lordships' time, but, knowing the deep interest that is felt in this question by noble Lords from Ireland, I deemed it right to give all the information I was able to get upon the subject.

*THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I am sure we are all exceedingly obliged to the noble and learned Lord for the very long statement he has made, but when your Lordships come to examine it it will be found that the question asked by Lord Clonbrock—namely, whether any, and, if so, what recommendations of the Fry Commission will be carried into effect in addition to those already adopted—has not been answered. The noble Lord considered at length those of the recommendations which had already been adopted, and he also made some remarks with regard to prices, upon which Lord Clonbrock did not say one word. The question of prices did not enter into the noble Lord's mind at all. The fact of the matter with regard to prices is that the Land Commission have an agricultural department which publishes prices, and a department which fixes the rents, and it is impossible to reconcile the tables. For instance, the reduction in agricultural prices is given at 4·7 per cent., whilst the reduction in rents has been 24·7 per cent. That shows how little the reduction in agricultural prices affects the reduction in rent. With regard to what the noble Lord said as to the constitution of the Land Commission, I should like to say that we do not dispute that the members are most honourable men. We have not said otherwise in this House or elsewhere, and surely gossip outside is not worthy of the noble Lord's attention. With regard to the definition of fair rent, it would appear that all the legal luminaries in Ireland have come together to try and decide the point, but they do not agree with the Fry Commission. But the Land Commission are in this position: they have to fix our rents, and they have no definition of what fair rent is. I was not satisfied with what the noble Lord said with regard to deterioration. The Land Commission carry out strictly the rule that tenants' improvements must not be charged with rent, but they seldom pay attention to the repeated instances of tenants' deterioration. The noble and learned Lord gave only one instance in which Mr. Justice Meredith dealt hardly with a case of deterioration, but throughout the whole of Ireland this question is a most important one. The sub-commissioners do not make any allowance for deterioration, but allow fully for tenants' improvements. What the noble and learned Lord said on that matter was not at all satisfactory. I understood from his reply that the going backwards and forwards of the court valuers will not occur in the future, but I did not gather from anything he said that any of the recommendations of the Fry Commission which have not already been adopted will be carried out. The statement that the court valuers will not act in a dual capacity in future is most satisfactory, because their goings on hitherto have been, to say the least, open to suspicion. Then the noble and learned Lord argued that the court valuers should be provided with the Pink Schedule and all the information in the possession of the sub-commissioners. Surely, when a valuer is called in it is only fair that we should have an entirely independent opinion. We do not want the opinion of a man who is biassed by the opinion of his subordinates. There is no doubt that the court valuers must be biassed by having all the evidence of the sub-commission in front of them. I do not think it is at all satisfactory that the recommendation of the Fry Commission on this point has not been carried out. With regard to purchase, as the noble and learned Lord has said, it is going on vigorously and hopefully; but from the point of view of the landlords it is certainly not going on generously, because the Land Commission acts simply as a cautious banker of the Treasury. The answer of the noble and learned Lord seems to amount to this, that no further advance is to take place with regard to the recommendations of the Fry Commission. I regret that the answer is not of a more satisfactory character.

*VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN: My Lords, I venture to support Lord Clonbrock in the question he has brought before the House. However honourable a body of men the Land Commissioners may be, their point of view regarding what ought to be done on the question of the valuing of rents in Ireland is, to say the least, peculiar. The noble and learned Lord said that the Land Commission made their rules with a view to the consideration of justice from their own point of view. In that I heartily concur. It is from their own point of view, and from no other, that they consider the whole transaction. The noble and learned Lord said that it required an Act of Parliament to give a definition of fair rent, or to read the definition into the Act of 1881. I do not deny that that may be so, but I do contend that it is impossible to fix a fair rent unless the Commissioners have some definition of the phrase before them, and that until some definition is produced justice cannot be done to the Irish landlords.

One of the highest authorities who has discussed the question said that the only test of value was the price which the tenant was willing to pay, but that price is entirely excluded in Ireland. I would ask the noble and learned Lord where in Ireland is a landlord able to get the rent which a solvent tenant would offer him? And why is he not able to get it? Because of the Act of 1881. The Land Commissioners fix rents at the present moment on the wildest principles. The noble and learned Lord has referred with a great deal of satisfaction to the fact that applications to purchase farms in Ireland have risen from 2,000 to 6,000 odd. I do not know how he explained that, but I should like to offer an explanation. The increase in the number of applications to purchase farms is due to two causes — first, the reductions in the rents have been so tremendous that the landowners have been forced to sell their land; and secondly, the tenants are waking up to the fact that they can buy land for less than they can sell their own interest in their farms. The noble and learned Lord said more than once, "Oh, that happened years ago." I want to quote to your Lordships a few figures showing what has occurred since the second fixing of rent in Ireland. Here is one estate. The rent in 1881 was £237 5s. 10d., the poor-law valuation being £151. In the first term the rent was reduced from £237 5s. 10d. to £159 2s. 6d., and in the second term, in 1896, to £79 10s. 2d., or something less than half the poor-law valuation. I will not mention names, but here is another case: The rent of the estate prior to 1881 was £205 15s. 6d., the poor-law valuation being £176. In the first term the rent was reduced to £162 17s., and in the second term, four years ago, to £95 6s. 6d. I do not know what justifies these reductions, for they are certainly not due to economic causes or fall of prices. I will quote another case selected out of many. The old rent was £351 9s. 4d. It was reduced on the first term to £246 18s. 3d., and was further reduced at the last hearing to £159 19s. 5d. That is to say, in fifteen years, starting from 1881, these rents were reduced on an average by 60 per cent. I think I have said enough to show that the question of fixing rents in Ireland is one that still requires attention from Her Majesty's Government. If this process is continued and the fads of the tenants are given way to as they are at present, landlords will end by paying tenants to take their property. It is said that the fall in prices accounts for the reduction in rent, but I could quote many cases which prove the contrary. The particulars of a case were placed in my hands the other day by one of the land agents in Ireland in which the rents had been reduced by about 50 per cent., whereas the value of the farm and the prices generally had gone up. I would ask the noble and learned Lord how he can justify reductions in a case of that kind? I am sorry the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has not dealt more satisfactorily with the matter. I hope questions such as these will be brought frequently before the House, in order that your Lordships may be convinced that the hardships of which we complain are real and substantial and require remedying.

*THE EARL OF ARRAN: My Lords, I do not rise to make a speech, but I should like to draw your Lordships' attention to the fact that at the last sitting of the Land Commission at Belfast twenty-five appeals from decisions of the sub-commissioners were heard. In eighteen cases the rents were raised, and in seven only were the decisions confirmed. That is a remarkable number of decisions to be reversed by the Higher Court, and I would ask what your Lordships would think of a Court of First Instance whose decisions were reversed to this extent. I do not reflect upon the sub-commissioners; they are all honourable men. Brutus was an honourable man, but I do not suppose Cæsar found much comfort in that fact.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL—ITS EFFECT ON LANDOWNERS.

*THE EARL OF LICHFIELD: My Lords, I rise to ask the Secretary of State for War why no notice was given to owners of lands affected by the Military Manœuvres Bill previous to or during the passage of the Bill through the House of Lords, and to call attention to the injury which will be inflicted by the Bill in some cases. In order to make my case quite plain it will be necessary for me to refer to some of the provisions of the so-called Military Manœuvres Bill, and to call attention to the manner in which the Government passed this Bill through your Lordships' House. Clause 4 of the Military Manœuvres Bill confers upon the War Office power to take compulsory possession of certain specified areas of country for twenty days every year, for the purpose of rifle practice, and, in some cases, of artillery practice, under service conditions. During this time no person is to be permitted, under penalties imposed by means of bye-laws framed by the War Office, to enter upon the specified area, except with the consent of the Secretary of State for War, and under such conditions as he may impose. On each occasion, after the War Office have used these lands, compensation for damage to persons or property, and for interference with rights or privileges, is to be provided, but at the will of an arbitrator appointed by the Government; and no compensation is payable if the arbitrator holds that the damage or loss could have been prevented by the taking of reasonable measures for securing safety. The areas specified in the Bill for rifle practice are as follows:—Crown lands at Woolmer, Cannock Chase, a portion of the South Downs between Lewes and Brighton, and a district of the New Forest; those specified for rifle or artillery practice are Dartmoor, a tract of country in North Wales, and three tracts of country—Morne Mountains, Kilworth, and Glen Marsh—in Ireland. I may say that on a rough calculation, but, I believe, a fairly reliable one, there are between 300 and 400 square miles of land, or from 200,000 to 300,000 acres scheduled in this Bill. No notices whatever have been given to the landowners, commoners, or the local authorities, and yet the lands in question are scheduled in perpetuity. We have had several War Office Bills before us lately, and I confess that this Bill escaped my notice during its passage through the House, and as far as I can learn it also escaped the notice of many other peers in the same way. I must congratulate the Government on having got the Bill through without any alterations, because I am quite sure that if attention had been drawn to the provisions of the Bill it would not have passed the House in its present form. There are some maps in the adjoining chamber showing the areas scheduled, and on examining them I discovered that between two and three thousand acres of my own property at Cannock Chase had been scheduled, part of which runs up to the gates of my park. The larger portion of these lands is open common heather-land, on which are grouse, black game, and some wild fallow deer, while some of it is freehold with small holdings, and the remainder consists of a beautiful wild park, within a mile and a-half from my hall door, not my home park, but forming a very important part of my home. My neighbour, Sir Charles Wolseley, also has his fine park, of some 450 acres, scheduled without his knowledge or consent. These parks are very valuable, being within a short distance of a junction on the main L. and N.W.R. line. I will not, however, detain you any longer with my personal grievance, my object is rather to call your attention to the unprecedented provisions of the Bill. These properties are all scheduled in perpetuity without giving the owners any notice or opportunity of defending their rights. I maintain the prospective value of the scheduled lands will be irretrievably damaged. They will be looked upon as plague spots, and no one will buy them for building or manufacturing purposes, as the owner would be liable to be turned out for three weeks in every year; then again the value of the sporting rights will be seriously diminished. I have, myself, valuable sporting rights over these lands, having killed as many as a hundred brace of grouse there in one day, but do you suppose for a moment that anyone would think of hiring these shootings with the knowledge that the Secretary of State for War could have three weeks' shooting on them at any time he liked? Compulsory purchase and compulsory hiring of land have already been heard of in Parliament, but this is the first case of a Government, calling itself a constitutional Government, going in for compulsory land grabbing, pure and simple, without paying one penny compensation whatever. And now I come to the question of the commons and open spaces scheduled in these areas, not by any means the least important part of my case. It is computed that about 100,000 acres of open common lands have been scheduled; the unfortunate commoners will have to drive their cattle and sheep off the scheduled areas, and in some cases they will even have to turn out of their homes, for twenty days in every year, without having had any opportunity of protesting against this serious curtailment of their rights. There is no doubt they are very hardly treated under this Bill. The public, again, will be kept off these open spaces during twenty days of our all too short summer weather, and in this respect I maintain that the provisions of the measure are quite contrary to the public opinion of the day, and to the practice of Parliament of late years, which has been to maintain these open spaces free to the public for ever. It seems to me that the Government have missed a splendid opportunity. When the country to a man wishes to do everything possible to increase the efficiency of the Army—and there is no body of men more anxious to do this than your Lordships—the Government ought to have come to Parliament and asked for money to acquire ground on which our soldiers can shoot under service conditions. I am quite sure that money for that purpose would have been cheerfully given by Parliament, but they were afraid to ask for the money, and instead of that they are attempting to take land without paying anything at all for it. I do not think the landowners would have complained so much if this were a temporary measure, but these lands are scheduled in perpetuity. To show your Lordships what is thought of this Bill, I heard from a friend the other day whose land is also scheduled, and in his letter he says—

> "I could have understood it from a Radical Government, but not from a Government that calls itself Conservative."

No, my Lords, this is truly a case of "Save us from our friends," for I do not believe for a moment that any Radical Government would have brought in a measure framed on these lines, if only on account of the great commons and open spaces involved. Moreover, I venture to suggest that the manner in which the Bill was carried through the House was quite unconstitutional, and not in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House. I have mentioned the matter to the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, and I hope he will be good enough to state his opinion to the House, as I feel sure your Lordships would be interested to hear it. If it should turn out that my suggestion is a justifiable one, and that this Bill has not been passed in conformity to the Standing Orders, I hope the Government will see their way to withdraw the Bill, as some mark of respect to this House for having got it through in an unconstitutional manner, or if they decline to do so, I trust that, in justice to all who are concerned in the areas to be taken, they will refer the matter to a Select Committee. We all know what an immense amount of responsibility rests on the shoulders of the Secretary of State for War, and how much he has on his hands, at the present moment; it is therefore with great regret that I have felt obliged to ask him for an explanation of this matter, but I have looked upon it as a public duty to do so, and I hope your Lordships will think that I have been justified in my action. The two points I have specially to impress on the House are, in the first place, that a Bill of this nature ought not to have been introduced without holding local inquiries and without giving full notice to all parties interested—landowners, commoners, and local authorities—as prescribed by the Standing Orders and practice of Parliament; and, in the second place, that it is sought to acquire rights over these scheduled lands in perpetuity without giving any compensation whatever for doing so.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I must say, in the first place, a few words with regard to the noble Lord's complaint that there has been in the case of this Bill a disregard of the Standing Orders of your Lordships' House. I understand his view to be that the fourth section of the Bill is of such a kind that it was the duty of the Department responsible for the measure to issue notices last autumn in the usual manner to the owners and occupiers of the land scheduled under the Bill. I have looked at the Standing Orders of your Lordships' House, and I am bound to say that I do not at first sight see anything in them which leads me to believe that this particular part of the Bill is of such a character as to render it incumbent upon the Department to issue notices; but I am very far from claiming to be a skilled interpreter of the Standing Orders, which are somewhat intricate documents, and I prefer to rest myself on the fact that the very experienced gentlemen who assisted us in the preparation of the Bill did not detect any necessity for issuing notices, and, moreover, that the officers of your Lordships' House, who are, I understand, entrusted with the duty of exercising a certain amount of vigilance upon the irregularities of persons in charge of legislation, did not, at the time certainly, detect that any irregularity had taken place. Of course, if we had been aware that the issuing of notices had been necessary it might have been desirable that we should call the attention of the Examiners to the matter; but I gather from a well-known work—Sir Erskine May's "Parliamentary Practice"—that it is, in the natural order of things, the function, not of the person responsible for the Bill, but of the officers of the House to call attention to the necessity of referring the Bill to the examiners. It is stated on page 443 of the work to which I have referred—

> "If it appears, after the First Reading, that a public Bill affects private rights, notice of this circumstance is sent from the Public Bill Office to the Member in charge of the Bill; and the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills are ordered to examine the Bill with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills."

If there was a want of vigilance it was a want of vigilance for which many of us were responsible, and a want of vigilance which, in the circumstances of the case, does not seem to be worthy of any kind of censure. There is also this to be said in fairness to the Department—that other Bills authorising the holding of military manœuvres in different parts of the country, Bills substantially for the same purpose as this Bill, have never been sent to the examiners.

*The Earl of LICHFIELD: Those were temporary Bills.

*The Marquess of LANSDOWNE: I freely admit that those Bills were of temporary operation, and that this Bill is a permanent measure. The question as to the necessity of notices is not yet disposed of, because I believe it is the case that the Bill has come before the Examiner in the other House of Parliament, and I am told—I do not know whether the authority is good—that he has reported that there has been a breach of the Standing Order, but not of the Standing Order relating to the service of notices on owners and occupiers, but of that relating to the publication of advertisements. The matter is still sub judice, and until the question has been disposed of by the Committee in another place, I think I must claim that the point raised by the noble Earl with regard to the non-compliance with the Standing Orders is still an open question. In the meantime no harm has been done because the owners and occupiers of land affected have still an opportunity of raising in another place the question which the noble Earl has raised here, and I have no doubt, if their case is as good as he supposes, they will be able to obtain the redress which they desire. The noble Lord seems to think that he personally has been very badly used, because he received no notice that the Bill affected his private rights to the extent it does. I certainly cannot admit, that so far as the noble Earl is concerned, there was any attempt on the part of the War Office to steal a march upon him. I do not know any Member of your Lordships' House who would be less likely to be caught napping than the noble Earl, who is a constant frequenter of the House. He takes part in the debates, and pays a good deal of attention to our business, and I think he himself admitted that he had not been quite as watchful as he might have been when he made what I would certainly describe as a Second Reading speech on the Bill after it had gone to the other House of Parliament. The Bill was introduced by me in this House on 28th May. I then stated, not at very great length, but I think with sufficient clearness, what the object of the Bill was. I called particular attention to the fourth clause, which I said was to my mind a very important clause, and I gave the reasons for which it was necessary. I referred to the areas which were to be scheduled, and I referred by name to Cannock Chase. I am bound also to add that the noble Earl was in the House at the time. I have a distinct recollection of having seen him on the particular evening, and I see, on reference to the Journals of the House, that he took part in a division a few minutes before I made the statement. Therefore, there was a reasonable opportunity for him to make himself aware of what the nature of the Bill was. The Bill was read a second time on 22nd June, but before that day I had maps showing the scheduled areas exhibited in an adjoining chamber, and on 25th June the measure passed through Committee. The noble Earl told your Lordships that no attention was paid to it in Committee. That is not quite the case. One noble

Lord, Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, who evidently knew that his property in the neighbourhood of the New Forest would be affected, called attention to the Bill. The Bill went to the Standing Committee, and was read a third time on 28th June, so that it was for a whole month within the cognisance of your Lordships' House. As I have referred to Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, I desire to point out that all the landowners who are affected by the measure do not regard it in the hostile and uncompromising spirit which the noble Earl has exhibited. I hold in my hand an extract from a south country newspaper, containing a report of the proceedings of the New Forest Court of Verderers. The report states that—

"Lord Montagu said he would go further and say that a Bill of this character ought to pass, and his Lordship pointed out the difficulties which our soldiers had had to face in South Africa, adding that it was absolutely essential that they should practise in parts of the country at unknown distances under service conditions. As patriotic people they must do the best they could and make the best of it."

Another gentleman, speaking individually, and as representing other Commoners, said—

"He thought they were all agreed there should be no local opposition to the Bill under the present circumstances, as it certainly was their duty to do all they could to provide the troops with proper practising and firing grounds."

That is the spirit in which the Bill has been met in some parts of the country, and I cannot help feeling that if the noble Earl had shown a little more of that spirit in his remarks, he would have treated the subject in a worthier manner. As to the alleged iniquity of the Bill, I am not prepared for a moment to say that in matters of detail the Bill may not require amendment. I am sorry that attention was not called to its details in the House. I can conceive nothing more useful in the case of a measure of this kind than thorough discussion in an assembly like this, in which owners of land are so largely represented. As to the principle of the Bill we take power, under it, to use for a few days in the year certain areas of moorland country, and to close them to the public—a measure which is necessary in the interests of the public itself if these areas are used for rifle and artillery practice. Then we provide for compensation, and the compensation clause is drawn in a most liberal manner. The clause provides that full compensation shall be made for any damage to person and property, or any loss or any interference with rights or privileges, occasioned by the exercise of the powers given by this section, and for any expenses incurred by any person in taking any reasonable measures for securing the safety of any person or property. That is a clause which would provide ample satisfaction for injury, for instance, to those sporting rights to which the noble Earl attaches so much importance. The noble Earl told us that nobody would ever build on one of these scheduled areas. I do not see the least reason why they should not. If buildings grow up the effect would be that the troops would not go there to manœuvre, for if we attempted to manœuvre troops over a district in which cottages were beginning to grow up we should find ourselves face to face with such a claim for compensation as would render it altogether beyond the powers of the public purse to provide adequately for. I venture to press upon your Lordships that powers of this kind are very urgently needed in the interests of the Army. I do not believe there is any country in Europe in which private rights are allowed to prevail to the detriment of the efficiency of the Army as they are allowed to prevail in this country. If those rights prevail, if our troops are to be exercised merely in barrack squares, along the high roads, or in places such as Aldershot, with every feature of which they are thoroughly acquainted, then we cannot expect that our soldiers will exhibit when called upon for service in the field the qualities of resource and readiness which we desire they should possess. I earnestly hope that, however much this Bill may be amended, we shall in substance be given the powers we ask for.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I must plead guilty of not myself having observed the precise nature of this Bill, and of not reading it with sufficient care. I thought it was a Bill of the same nature as those which Radical Governments to which I have belonged have brought in. Those Bills, however, were annual Bills, and therein lies the great difference. I agree with what the noble Marquess has said as to the necessity for having large tracts of land for manœuvres, but I think it is a very strong measure indeed to take permanent possession of private property by a Bill in this manner. It is an alarming thing. If once the Government are to be given power to take land in this way, without that kind of inquiry which is always made whenever private property is taken, it will open the door to all manner of things. I am not very likely to belong to another Government, but if I do I hope they will not take this as a precedent and adopt this method of dealing with private property. It is very necessary that private property should be taken for public purposes, but whenever that is done it has been a fixed principle in this country to give full notice and compensation to everybody whose property is taken, and an opportunity for them to bring their objections before the Houses of Parliament. I regret one little remark made by the noble Marquess, who rather insinuated that the noble Earl had not shown a proper patriotic spirit. This is not a question of patriotism at all. It is a very cheap kind of patriotism to take other people's land. It is desirable that impediments should not be thrown in the way of the Government in making our forces sufficiently strong for all purposes required, but I protest against our being thereby debarred from looking into the nature of the Bills brought in. I should very much prefer that such Bills should be of a temporary nature, so that Parliament may from time to time have an opportunity of revising them and of seeing whether their continuance is necessary. I cannot, of course, anticipate what may be the decision of the other House, but I hope, at all events, that the course the noble Earl has taken will cause more attention to be paid to the Bill than unfortunately was paid in this House.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): The noble Earl who brought forward this question appealed to me as to whether or not the Standing Orders had been broken in the passage of this Bill through the House. The usual custom is that when a public Bill deals with private rights it is referred to the Examiners. I must plead guilty of some negligence in the case of this Bill, which I did not look carefully into. I have inquired of the officers of the House, and I am told that Military Manœuvres Bills have never been referred to the Examiners, and that they did not see the necessity of taking that course with regard to this Bill. In the House of Commons the Bill has been referred to the Examiners on Standing Orders, and I believe they have decided that the definite Standing Orders of that House dealing with the point in question have not been complied with. What course the House of Commons will pursue it is impossible to say, but I cannot help very strongly supporting the view taken by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition. To take these important rights in perpetuity, and without giving the slightest notice either to individuals, or even to the local authorities who are responsible for the districts in which the rights are taken, seems to we a most high-handed and unparalleled proceeding. I quite sympathise with what has fallen from my noble friend as to the necessity of having land on which to exercise our military forces, but that does not absolve the Government Department that brings forward a Bill of this kind from the necessity of giving the persons who are affected ample notice. In this case there was no notice whatever until the Bill was brought into your Lordships' House. The Bill, as my noble friend said, was read a first time before the Whitsuntide holidays. It was read a second time the Friday after we reassembled, and it passed through all its stages during the ensuing week, and was read a third time on the Thursday following. During that time it was impossible for anyone in the country to know what was going on. I earnestly hope that in future, at any rate, it may be a warning to public Departments that in matters of this kind they should give notice in local newspapers and to local authorities, and not merely in the London Gazette.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to relieve members of county councils and other local authorities from disqualification by reason of absence when such members are serving with the Regular or Auxiliary forces in South Africa or elsewhere. When I asked a question of Her Majesty's Government some weeks ago on this subject, the Prime Minister practically admitted the hardship of such cases, but suggested that the matter should be put aside for a time until an idea could be formed as to the duration of the war. I imagine that it is impossible to wait much longer if legislation on the subject is to pass both Houses this session, and, therefore, I have ventured to bring in this Bill, which I trust your Lordships will read a second time to-day. The subject has been before the County Councils Association, and a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of such relief being given. I may also say that I have heard from the Association of Poor Law Unions expressing approval of the measure, and I hope that it may become law.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Duke of Northumberland.)

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I entirely agree as to the desirability of relieving officers and men who are serving for a short period on active service abroad from the penalty of losing their seats; but I think some limit should be inserted, otherwise the Bill might be taken to include officers serving in India for ten years, and this would mean serious inconvenience to local authorities.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, on behalf of the Local Government Board I have to say that they are in entire agreement with the principle of the Bill. It may, however, be necessary to suggest one or two Amendments in Committee. I have to ask the noble Duke to put the Committee stage down for Monday, so that the Bill may go before the Standing Committee the next day.

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND: In reply to the noble Earl opposite, I may say that the Bill has been drawn with as wide a scope as possible, because I recognised that it would be much easier to narrow the scope of the Bill than to extend it. I shall be happy to consider any Amendments that may be suggested.

On Question agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

CRUELTY TO WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, I may explain that this Bill passed through the House of Commons, where it was introduced by a private Member, without opposition. It is not in the proper sense of the term a Bill brought forward by Her Majesty's Government, and I am only taking charge of it as a person interested in the subject. I am sure the Bill is one which will commend itself to your Lordships. Existing statutes for the prevention of cruelty to animals (with the exception of one relating to vivisection) include only domestic animals, i.e., those animals which, by their nature, are accustomed to mankind. Wild animals in captivity, and animals which are domesticated although not domestic, and animals which have not been sufficiently tamed to serve some purpose for the use of man, are still without protection from such cruelty as falls short of actual maiming or wounding. To these animals it is the object of the Bill to extend protection. Animals in a menagerie are, I understand, in training often subject to great cruelty. Perhaps your Lordships may recollect an incident which called the attention of the public to this subject. I refer to the cruelty which was inflicted on two elephants at the Crystal Palace. The elephants themselves adopted a course which brought the matter prominently before the public. One elephant mortally injured his keeper, and, having broken from his captivity, proceeded in a direct line to a house occupied by a member of Her Majesty's Government. The elephant broke into the grounds, devastated the shrubberies, and finally pulled down the vineries. This Bill is not intended to deal with cruelty alleged to arise in sport, such as stag-hunting or rabbit coursing, nor in the preparation of animals, etc., for the food of mankind, nor in process of scientific experiment, as these are matters which may be open to controversy. Scotland is excluded, as there are special statutes for the prevention of cruelty in that country. Its only object is to save birds, beasts, fishes, and reptiles, at present unprotected, from unnecessary suffering, wantonly or unreasonably inflicted whilst they are actually in a state of captivity without chance of escape.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord James of Hereford.)

*VISCOUNT GALWAY: I am glad to hear my noble and learned friend say that this Bill will not affect sparrow shooting and rabbit coursing, which are very popular in the North of England; but I think care should be taken in the wording, so that it will not be in the power of faddists to commence prosecutions all over the country.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: I am afraid I must disagree with the noble Viscount who has just spoken. I regret very much that the Bill does not deal with rabbit coursing, which, as practised in the neighbourhood of many large towns, is unmitigated cruelty, without any kind of sport about it. I beg to say that I shall move an Amendment to insert rabbit coursing when the Bill is in Committee.

THE EARL OF MAYO: The objection of my noble friend with regard to rabbit coursing might apply to stag hunting, and that would be a serious matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I hope I read the Bill rightly—the noble and learned Lord will tell me if I am wrong—but it seems to me that the cases mentioned do not come under the Bill at all, because stags and rabbits when let loose are not under confinement. For my part, I should be only too delighted to see the hunting of the tame stag entirely abolished. I should like to know whether worm fishing will not be affected by this Bill; the creature is a reptile, and in fishing is subject to an appliance which hinders its escape.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): I must say I regard this Bill with some apprehension lest in the absence of a precise definition certain cruelties may be made to come under the Bill, and thus great annoyance be caused. The turning of a fox out of a bag to be hunted is about as cruel a performance as any I can imagine.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: With reference to the observation of the noble Earl, the Earl of Portsmouth, I would point out that the Bill comes from the House of Commons as an unopposed Bill, and that any extension of its provisions will imperil its passing during the present session. I hope we shall not in this case allow the best to be the enemy of the good. I have not heard one word in the discussion which gives any reason why you should provide protection for a cat or a dog and refuse protection to other animals whose freedom has been taken away and who are kept in captivity.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: After what the noble and learned Lord has said I shall not persevere in the Amendment of which I gave notice.

On Question agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

DESECRATION IN YORKSHIRE CHURCHES.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: My Lords, I rise to ask the Lord Chancellor whether his attention has been called to the proceedings of a gang of disorderly persons who in Yorkshire and elsewhere have been entering into churches and removing the ornaments and furniture of the church, as well as destroying or defacing memorials erected in churchyards; and whether there is any law under which such persons can be brought to justice. I shall not detain your Lordships many minutes in speaking to this question. I regret very much to be obliged to bring such a matter before the House. I assure your Lordships that I do so, not from any theological standpoint, but because it relates to an offence against property, aggravated by the fact that the property belongs to the church. I will illustrate the matter by an occurrence in my own diocese. A number of the persons to whom I have referred entered a church, forcibly removing from it part of the ornaments and carrying them off towards the railway station. There was no attempt at concealment, the ornaments being found in their arms. They had with them, I am told, the sub-editor of a well-known newspaper, evidently desirous of notoriety. The persons chiefly interested in that parish very naturally sought means of bringing these offenders to justice. In addition to the injury done to the church, there was a still more shocking outrage in the case of a churchyard, where they defaced and, to some extent, destroyed a memorial which had been put up under touching circumstances. The persons interested in the former case sought legal advice, and were informed that there is really no remedy; that there is no statute of the realm under which these persons can be brought to justice. If so, it is a very serious defect in the law, and I would like to know from the Lord Chancellor whether these legal advisers are right or not. I shall be glad if the Lord Chancellor is able to tell me they are not right, and that there is a remedy. If not, it seems these criminals cannot be punished, and may go all over the country perpetrating similar outrages without being brought to justice. I earnestly trust a remedy may be found if none exists. I am the more eager to have an answer because, if there is no remedy, there will be a danger of serious conflicts between the proper guardians of church property and these intruders who come and carry away and destroy it.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, the most rev. Prelate disclaimed any theological view of this question, and I need not say that I am desirous of doing the same. It would be extremely undesirable in one called upon to preside over the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to which all questions of the sort at which the most reverend prelate glanced ultimately come, to express any view adverse to or in favour of persons who may be supposed to be actuated by religious zeal on the one side or the other. I hope I may be permitted to disclaim any partiality for people who resort to outrage and violence, whether on one side or the other. It is, of course, impossible not to know that very serious questions may arise, which, of course, may lead to serious breaches of the peace unless the law is put in force as far as it can be against these disturbers of the peace. I have no sympathy with either. I have no sympathy with a clergyman who thinks proper to assume to himself the power of the State, and to make a brawl in a church in forbidding a marriage which Parliament has authorised, and which he has no authority or power to prevent, but which he can make disagreeable to the persons about to be married by making a brawl in the church. Neither have I any sympathy with a layman who thinks it proper that he should be invested with more power than the State itself possesses, and, in spite of the rights of others, takes upon himself the character of an iconoclast and destroys what he thinks is an improper thing to be in a church. The law is open to either of them, and it has, I believe, a remedy for either of them if anything wrong is done. And I must say, speaking here, that I can but most earnestly deprecate any association of persons who go about for the purpose of taking the law into their own hands, as they are from time to time said to do. I am astonished to find that anybody suggested that such offences as these are not already within the law, and that there is no remedy. I should have imagined that anybody consulted on the subject would have only to refer to an Act of Parliament which says that any person who shall maliciously or contemptuously pull down tables or otherwise break any altar, or spoil crucifixes or crosses in any church or chapel, may be arrested then and there, and may get three months imprisonment with hard labour. That is one of the remedies, but it is not the only remedy. I ought to mention in this view that I have received a letter to-day from a gentleman who signs himself "John Kensit." He says that from the most rev. Prelate's question he has reason to suspect that his intention is, by innuendo, to charge him and his preachers—the most rev. Prelate described them by another name—with certain acts. Mr. Kensit writes—

> "I enclose you a full account of the only act we have been guilty of. As to the cross and the large wayside crucifix which were broken at Hensall, we have nothing to do with that. My twelve Wycliffe preachers are all God-fearing men, and we are simply exposing priestly lawlessness which his Grace is openly allowing. I trust you will do me this justice."

I do not know what act of justice Mr. Kensit alludes to, but I understand he means the reading of the letter. I have now done him that justice. I am glad he disclaims the horrible and sacrilegous outrages on graveyard monuments, which were broken in pieces by a number of persons. I think I might venture to suggest to him and others that when once they begin a career of violence it is the inevitable result that others will go beyond them. I can only say in answer to the question of the most rev. prelate that I believe it to be absolutely incorrect to say that the law has no remedy for those acts. I believe that, apart from the particular Act of Parliament which I have quoted, if the magistrates and constables will do their duty, it will be easy to put down outrages of this description, and I hope that in the future they will recognise the fact that they have the power to do it.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: I desire to express my satisfaction to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack for what he has said, and I can only express the hope that the noble and learned Lord's correspondent will read the proceedings of the House this afternoon.

*VISCOUNT HALIFAX: My Lords, the persons whom Mr. Kensit describes as his Wycliffe preachers, and who are supposed to be "God-fearing" men, have done me the honour to visit my parish in Yorkshire. They arrived dressed up in khaki hats, and one of them was known in the village as a disreputable tout who haunts racecourses. They went round the village followed by a large crowd, and were listened to for some little time with a kind of contemptuous patience, but when they began to abuse me my people, who have some regard for me, could bear it no longer, and they turned them out of the village. This was perhaps the best way of treating them. When they came into the village they made remarks on some crosses in the churchyard, one of which I had put up over the grave of my children, and said it would not be long before they were pulled down. We took precautions for some time to prevent any damage, but, of course, one cannot be protecting churchyards day and night. Shortly afterwards a notice appeared in a periodical for which Mr. Kensit is responsible, in which it was stated, as a matter of great congratulation, that a large cross put up by a neighbouring clergyman had been destroyed at Hensall, and that there was every reason to hope that a similar fate would befall the cross in the churchyard at Hickleton. When people threaten to destroy crosses placed in churchyards to commemorate the dead, and shortly afterwards those crosses are destroyed, it does not require any great amount of imagination to discover who are responsible for their destruction.

The Earl of Halsbury.

COPYRIGHT BILL [H.L.].

[COMMITTEE.]

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

*LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, in moving that the House do resolve itself into Committee on this Bill, I would point out that this is the third session in which a comprehensive literary copyright Bill has been before a Select Committee of this House, and that the Bill is, therefore, the product of three years consideration. Witnesses have been examined this year as on former occasions, and many written suggestions have been considered, but no very serious alterations have been made in the Bill, and with one exception it is not necessary to refer to any alteration. That exception is as to abridgments. Some of the scientific societies seemed to think that the publication of their reports might be affected. The Select Committee have put in an addition to sub-section (5) of Clause 4 to the effect that fair extracts, not only when made for the purposes of a new work, or of criticism, as the clause first stood, but also in the course of reporting scientific information, shall not constitute an infringement of copyright. I hope that sub-section will remove any doubts that the scientific world may feel as to the justice of this measure, and they will see that there is no prospect of injustice to them arising out of it. When this Bill was introduced the Colonial Office suggested that this Bill, being different from that of last session, would have to be sent again to the Colonies for approval. But there is no reason, I think for doing so; there is only one clause in the Bill which affects the colonies, and that is one which they very much desire. It is intended to remedy a grievance from which Canada has suffered particularly for many years. As the law now stands, an English edition of a copyright work may be introduced into Canada to flood the market there, and to oust editions of English works that are published in Canada, but Canadians cannot introduce their copyright works into the United Kingdom. It is proposed to put the United Kingdom in precisely the same position as the colonies, and to prohibit the importation into the colonies of works copyrighted in the United Kingdom. There can be no doubt whatever that the colonies, are very strongly in favour of this Bill, and there is no reason to refer it to them. A telegram from Ottawa published in The Times on 5th July states that—

"The Copyright Bill stands for Second Reading in the House of Commons. Mr. Fisher informs me that he has every reason to believe it will become law this session. The Special Committee of the House find that the legislation covered by the Bill has been asked for by the Canadian Authors' Society and Canadian publishers, and on their representation and for the interest of Canadians concerned in copyright and publication in Canada the Bill is proposed. The Committee also find that the protection to Canadian publishers to be obtained by the Bill has the approval of the Society of Authors in Great Britain and of the British public. The Committee state that heretofore there has been constant friction and clashing of interests between those interested in copyright in Great Britain and those interested in copyright in Canada. At the present time we have the very satisfactory spectacle of these formerly clashing interests expressing themselves in harmony. It therefore appears likely that the passage of this measure will remove causes of difference, will confirm the harmony now existing, and will tend to do away with that conflict which has been a constant source of trouble in copyright legislation for many years past."

I have since heard that the Bill has passed the Canadian House of Congress, and is now before the Senate, who will certainly pass it. This Bill, by enabling Canada to make a law for exclusive copyright, will obviate the raising of difficult questions between the colony and the mother country. It is not only Canada that has expressed approval of this Bill as it now stands. There was a Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the British Empire held in London on 30th June. At that Congress it was moved by Mr. George N. Morang, and seconded by the Hon. Thomas Fergus, of New Zealand—

"Whereas the various Copyright Acts throughout the Empire are unnecessarily complicated and vexatious to certain dependencies, and whereas it is now contemplated to consolidate the same by a Bill now before the House of Lords, Resolved, therefore, that this Congress declares its approval of such measure, whereby the colonies are empowered to legislate for exclusive copyright, and earnestly trusts that it may speedily become law."

Therefore, my Lords, I scarcely think it can be possible for Her Majesty's Government to allege that they are acting in conformity with the wishes of the colonies if they do not give every facility for the passing of the Bill through Parliament this session.

House in Committee (according to Order).

The Amendments proposed by the Select Committee made.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 :—

LORD BURGHCLERE said he had been asked by many eminent dramatic writers to put down Amendments to Clause 5, which they feared would prejudice their interests in the performing rights of their dramatic works; but as he regarded the Bill on the whole as a very valuable measure, and should not like to injure the prospects of its passing, he would not move the Amendments; but, if necessary, would have them moved in another place.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to; Standing Committee negatived; the Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: The noble Lord has shown me the Memorandum of the Local Government Board on the point, and I am perfectly satisfied with it.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 3ª accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

PRIVATE BILLS (GROUP J).

Colonel GUNTER reported from the Committee on Group J of Private Bills, That Major Jameson, one of the Members of the said Committee, was not present during the Sitting of the Committee this day.

Ordered, That Major Jameson do attend the Committee on Group J of Private Bills upon Wednesday next, at half-past Eleven of the clock.

Report to lie upon the Table.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): I have to call the attention of the House to an irregularity which has been committed in one of the Private Bill Committee rooms this morning, and to ask the House to validate the proceedings of the Committee notwithstanding that irregularity. Under Standing Order 118 it is necessary, before an hon. Member can serve upon a Private Bill Committee, that he should sign a declaration to the effect that neither he nor his constituents are personally interested in the Bill coming before the Committee. When Group J met this morning, only three out of the four appointed Members were present, the fourth not being in attendance and not having signed his declaration. It then became a question for the Chairman of the Committee whether they should proceed with the Bill or not. The Standing Order says that no such Committee shall proceed to business until the declaration shall have been signed by each of the said Members, but, as all the parties were present, the Committee decided, in the general interests of the progress of the private business, to proceed. They therefore proceeded, and what I ask the House to do is to validate the proceedings, notwithstanding that the Standing Order has been broken. With regard to the future, I do not ask the House to come to any decision. All I ask is that the proceedings of this particular Committee to-day shall be made valid notwithstanding the fact that one Member who was appointed to be present had not signed the declaration when the Committee sat. I beg to move.

Ordered, That the Proceedings of the Committee, this day, on Group J of Private Bills, be deemed to be, and be, valid notwithstanding that a Member of the said Committee had failed to sign his Declaration in accordance with Standing Order 118.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—CO-OPERATION OF JAPAN IN SUPPRESSING DISTURBANCES.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now state the reply of the Japanese Government to the request of Her Majesty's Government that Japan should undertake the relief of the Legations and the suppression of the disturbances in Northern China; and whether Her Majesty's Government have offered to guarantee Japan protection at sea, if necessary, during such a campaign.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Japanese Government have stated that reinforcements, bringing up the number of their troops in China to 20,000, will be sent as rapidly as possible. One battalion and three batteries of artillery started for Ta-ku on Friday last. No application for such a guarantee as is referred to in the second question has been made by Japan, and no question of giving one has arisen.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Can the right hon. Gentleman state what day the Indian troops will arrive at Ta-ku?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is there any question of financial guarantee?

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs): Can the right hon. Gentleman state the date at which the request was made?

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): What has been the cause of the delay in the despatch of Japanese troops?

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): He may not answer.

BRITISH NAVAL AND MILITARY REINFORCEMENTS FOR CHINA.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the grave situation in China, Her Majesty's Government are arranging to further augment our naval and military forces there in addition to the increases already announced to the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: Considerable reinforcements both in men and ships are on the way, and Her Majesty's Government are quite prepared to take any action rendered necessary by the situation.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE.

MR. DALZIEL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is intended to propose a Supplementary Estimate or a Vote on Account in connection with the expedition to China.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Yes, Sir; it will be necessary to take a Supplementary Vote.

LATEST NEWS FROM CHINA.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there is any news from China.

*MR. BRODRICK: The accounts from Peking received through native sources which have been already published, show that the resistance of the Legations to the attacks made on them have made a great impression on the assailants, and there are grounds for hoping that Prince Ching, the late head of the Tsung-li Yamen, is exercising influence to protect the Legations against Prince Tuan and the Boxers. The reports from Tientsin show that further fighting may be expected there at any moment, but no doubt is expressed that the allied forces will maintain their position. The Japanese reinforcements are due at Ta-ku immediately, and the Indian troops will begin to arrive in China at the end of the week. Matters are at present quiet on the Yang-tsze, but further naval force is being moved up so as to be prepared for any calls for the maintenance of order.

WAR MATERIAL SUPPLIED TO CHINA FROM ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any knowledge as to the number of guns and the quantity of ammunition which have been exported from this country to China since the war between China and Japan; and whether he has any information as to the purchases of munitions of war which China has recently been making in European countries.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): Yes, Sir. Seventy-one guns of position with 11,740 rounds of ammunition; 123 field guns with 49,400 rounds of ammunition; and 297 machine guns with 4,228,400 rounds of ammunition have been supplied to China since 1895 from firms in this country. 460,000 Mauser rifles and 3,000,000 rounds of ammunition were supplied to China last year by a German firm. I may say that the figures as to the supplies from this country are not exhaustive, because the hon. Gentleman's question related to guns.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what amount of the war material this country has supplied to the South African Republics?

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): What was the amount of ammunition and guns supplied by Birmingham firms?

SUNDAY PUBLICATION OF DESPATCHES AT POST OFFICES.

COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-upon-Avon): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the deep interest taken in the Chinese crisis, he will, in conjunction with the Postmaster General, issue a Sunday telegram to the post offices throughout the United Kingdom when there is important news to communicate.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Such an arrangement as the hon. and gallant Member suggests shall be made.

NAVAL OFFICERS QUALIFIED AS INTERPRETERS.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will state the rank of the two officers who are qualified interpreters in Russian, of the three officers who are so qualified in French, and of the two officers qualified in German languages, now serving on Her Majesty's ships on the China Station.

MR. GOSCHEN: The rank of the officers qualified as interpreters is as follows:—In Russian, Lieutenant, R.N.; in French, Captain, Commander, Lieutenant, R.N.; in German, Surgeon, Staff Paymaster, R.N.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SIR W. BUTLER AND SIR A. MILNER—PUBLICATION OF DESPATCHES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the correspondence between Sir William Butler and the War Office and the Colonial Office, and the correspondence between Sir William Butler and Sir Alfred Milner before Sir William Butler's recall from the Cape command, will be included in the documents relating to public affairs in South Africa, whose publication has been promised within a fortnight from 5th July.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman will look back at some full answers I gave earlier in the session, I think he will be satisfied without pressing the question further.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect what answer he gave? That it was in the discretion of——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether in the publication of despatches and documents relating to political affairs in South Africa which will, according to his promise, be published within a fortnight from 5th July, will be included the minute or despatch or communication sent home by Sir William Butler, when commander of the forces in South Africa and acting governor of Cape Colony, in which he set forth his views of the military situation, of the forces required to be employed in the event of the outbreak of hostilities with the South African Republics, and the disposition which should be given to those forces.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This question is, of course, covered by the answer I have just given.

ROODEVAL ENGAGEMENT—CAPTURE OF THE DERBYSHIRES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state why the account, which for some time has been in the possession of the War Office, giving the details of the surrender of the 4th Battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment, has been withheld from publication. Will the right hon. Gentleman say that this is covered also by the answer he refers to?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not by that answer, but by another answer I have given. I have given a general reply on the subject of despatches, and that general reply covers particular cases.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me a particular reply in reference to this?

MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS AT THE FRONT—SIR W. FOSTER'S SUGGESTIONS.

SIR JAMES KITSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Colne Valley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consent to lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the correspondence which passed between the hon. Member for Ilkeston and the War Department in relation to medical and sanitary arrangements at the Cape.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no objection to laying the correspondence on the Table.

NATAL CORRESPONDENCE ON CENSORSHIP.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will grant the Return relating to Natal Correspondence, which is on the Notice Paper to-day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no objection to the Return if the hon. Gentleman asks for it.

MARTIAL LAW—COLESBERG CASES.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether two persons, named Van der Valt and Boogsen, were recently tried and convicted by a court-martial at Colesberg, in Cape Colony. Could he state to the House with what offence or offences they were charged, what were the sentences imposed by the court-martial, and did the Attorney General of the colony report against the justice of the conviction in either or both of these cases. Have the sentences been since reduced, and by what authority and on what grounds; and can he say whether military tribunals are still taking cognisance of offences against the criminal law of the colony, notwithstanding that the ordinary courts of the country are and have for some time been open.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The question seems to be addressed to me under a misapprehension that there has been a difference between the civil legal authority and the military. I am not aware that there has been any such difference. The question therefore concerns the proceedings of the military authorities in a district in which, with the concurrence of the Civil Government, martial law has been proclaimed, and would more properly have been addressed to the Under Secretary of State for War. But as a matter of courtesy to the right hon. Gentleman, I have ascertained that the two persons named were tried for rebellion and sentenced to five and ten years penal servitude respectively. I understand that the sentences were afterwards reduced on the recommendation of the Deputy Judge Advocate General, and, I assume, by the military authorities. As regards the fourth question, I am informed that military tribunals are not now taking cognisance of offences against the criminal law of the colony.

BRITISH PRISONERS RELEASED AND STILL CAPTIVE.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will consider the expediency of arranging for the publication of a list of the names of the officers and men recently prisoners of war at Pretoria, indicating those who have rejoined their regiments and those who are in hospital; and can he arrange to publish a list of officers and men still in the hands of the Boers, giving such information as to their probable whereabouts as may be available.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Most of the names of the officers and men released at Pretoria have been published, and the remainder will be published as soon as they reach the War Office; the further information alluded to by the hon. Member has not been supplied, and would be very difficult to obtain. Lists of some of the officers and men still in the hands of the Boers, and all available information, have been published. Endeavours are being made to secure the names of the rest.

CAPE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SIR A. MILNER.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether since the gentleman filling for the time being the post of Attorney General at the Cape is, under the provisions of the Cape Constitution Act, a member of the Cape Cabinet, the Governor of the Cape is responsible to the Colonial Office for the rejection of advice offered to him on matters of law by a minister responsible for that advice to the Cape Legislature.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: This is a hypothetical question, and the supposititious fact on which it is based has not, so far as I am aware, arisen.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Has not Sir Alfred Milner overruled the decision of the Cape Attorney General?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have just said that I am not aware that that has happened.

ANNEXATION OF THE TRANSVAAL IN 1877—CLAIMS UNDER SIR THEOPHILUS SHEPSTONE'S PROCLAMATION.

SIR MANCHERJEE BHOWNAGGREE (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that on the annexation of the Transvaal in 1877 a proclamation was issued by Sir Theophilus Shepstone stating that all claims against the late Government would be acknowledged by Her Majesty's Government, and paid out; whether he is aware that among those whose claims were to be so recognised there were a number of volunteers who formed a border force for the protection of the frontier against the raids of the Chief Sekukuni, and who were promised, in lieu of the unpaid balance of their allowances, a farm of 4,000 morgen north and north-west of the Zulu mountains; and whether he will take the matter now into his consideration with the view of giving effect to the pledges conveyed by the proclamation, as the claims in question have never been granted.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The proclamation of Sir Theophilus Shepstone of 12th April, 1877, contained a general promise of this character. I regret that I have not been able yet to trace the detailed records of these claims, and I am not therefore in a position to express any opinion. The claims were regarded as settled in 1877, according to the Report published in Parliamentary Paper C. 2144, page 378.

TREATMENT OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—CASE OF PRIVATE WEIR.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the War Office has received a letter from the Enniskillen Board of Guardians complaining that Private R. Weir, of the 27th Inniskilling Fusiliers, who was engaged at the front in South Africa, has been sent home disabled for life, and is now in Enniskillen workhouse and chargeable on the rates for the rest of his life; and whether it is proposed to give Weir a pension to enable him to support himself.

The following questions on the same subject also appeared on the Paper :—

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL : To ask the Under Secretary of State for War what explanation has the War Office to give for the removal from Netley Hospital of Private Robert Weir, of the 27th Inniskilling Fusiliers, who had served with his regiment all through the Natal campaign, and was sent home in an enfeebled state of body and mind, and of the deportation of this soldier, who is without a pension and has received no gratuity, to the workhouse at Enniskillen, where he is at present a pauper inmate.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) : To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the War Office has been called to the transfer of Private R. Weir, 27th Inniskilling Fusiliers, wounded in South Africa, from Netley Hospital to the Enniskillen work house ; whether this has been done under the order or regulations of the War Office ; and whether the War Office will take steps to make a more suitable provision for wounded and disabled soldiers, either by special vote for this purpose or by arranging for the application of part of the Mansion House or other funds for the relief of such cases.

MR. CHANNING : Before the hon. Gentleman replies may I ask his attention to the practical suggestions in my question ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : Perhaps the most convenient course will be to answer the three questions together.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL : No. I will ask the hon. Gentleman to answer mine separately.

*MR. WYNDHAM : The man referred to is evidently Private Robert Weir, of the Royal Irish Fusiliers, who was invalided home from South Africa as a lunatic. It was certified by the medical officer who examined Weir that his madness was not the result of Army service ; and therefore under the regulations no pension can be given to him. His friends were unable to receive him, and in accordance with the Army Act he was handed over to his parish authorities, who are alone responsible for his treatment.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.) : How long was this private in the Army ? Did the doctor pass him as sane when he enlisted ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : If the hon. Member means did the doctor pass him as sane on coming back from the Reserve, it is, I confess, a matter which requires investigation. Lunacy, I may point out, is occasionally intermittent, and a man may be subject to recurring fits at any moment.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : Could not a sum of money be voted from public funds for the relief of this man ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : I do not think the hon. Member quite sees the point. When a man, whether or not he be in the Army, is a lunatic he has to be put under proper supervision in some asylum. If that man is in possession of a pension from the Chelsea Hospital Commissioners, a portion is diverted to the funds of the asylum. When he has none, of course there is no money to go to the asylum.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN : Cannot the ratepayers of this particular union be relieved of the liability for his support by a grant of money from one of the many War Funds ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : That depends upon whether the lunacy is attributable to service in the Army. If it is decided it is not, as in this case, then no pension can be granted, and the charge falls on the parish.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL : Is it a fact that this man was wounded in the war, and is at present a pauper inmate of a lunatic asylum ?

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.) : Was he medically inspected before he embarked for South Africa ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : Yes, Sir. I may add that he was not wounded. The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension as to that.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL : Has the War Office not received a protest from the board of guardians in reference to this man being a charge on the rates ?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is proceeding to argue the question, which, as it appears on the Paper, has been fully answered. If he wishes to put a further question he can give notice of it.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: The first paragraph of my question has never been answered.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am not aware that a protest has been received; but it would not touch the facts of the question. The Chelsea Hospital Commissioners have power to give money in certain cases, but this is not one which comes within the category of cases to which they are permitted to vote money.

BOER EXPEDITION, 1884-5—MEDALS.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY (Bath): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that medals have recently been given to the survivors of those who took part in the expedition against raiders into Canada in 1866, also in the Red River Expedition in 1870, as well as those of more recent date, such as the late expedition in Ashanti, the Government will consider the claim of those troops who took part in the expedition in 1884-5 against the Boers who raided from the Transvaal into Bechuanaland, for which successful operations, in which many South African troops were engaged, no medal or decoration or special recognition of their services was given to the troops.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The operations, though successful, were not of a nature to justify the grant of a medal or decoration.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY: May I ask the reason?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Shortly, it is that there were no really active operations.

VOLUNTEER DEPUTY ASSISTANT ADJUTANT GENERAL.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an adjutant of a metropolitan corps has been appointed Deputy Assistant Adjutant General for Volunteers at the War Office; if so, what are his special qualifications for the appointment; and what has been his connection, if any, with provincial Volunteer corps, which form a large proportion of the Volunteer force.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Captain Engleheart, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, has been selected for this appointment. Past service as an adjutant of an important Volunteer corps was regarded as a necessary qualification for the position. The officer selected has filled that position for four years in one of the largest and most efficient corps in the metropolis. The Secretary of State has full confidence in the selection he has been advised to make. I may add that Volunteer officers of all corps have free access to General Turner, the Inspector General of Auxiliary Forces at the War Office.

ARMY CONTRACTORS AND MILITIA AND VOLUNTEER CONTRACTS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that after certain contractors' names had been struck off the list, commanding officers of Militia and Volunteer regiments have written letters to these contractors stating that they would continue to employ them, the contractors, in supplying clothing; and whether immediate and suitable action will be taken by the Government in such cases.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham, S.): The Secretary of State has no knowledge of any such letters as are referred to in the question. Militia clothing is supplied from the Government stores. Officers commanding Volunteer regiments have been made aware that the name of Messrs. Samuel Brothers has been struck off the list of firms with whom the War Office is willing to have dealings. The responsibility of obtaining proper and serviceable supplies, however, is with those officers, and the Secretary of State would not willingly interfere with their discretion in the matter. At the same time he does not consider it advisable that supplies for Volunteers should be obtained from firms who have been removed by the War Office from its list of contractors on account of the very bad quality of the articles delivered.

*Mr. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Am I to understand that the Secretary of State does not intend to give effect to his own decision, and that these commanding officers are to be allowed to employ these contractors?

*Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I have stated that the discretion in the matter is with the commanding officers, and the Secretary of State will not willingly interfere with their discretion.

*Mr. JAMES LOWTHER: Will he do so unwillingly?

*Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: We trust that the commanding officers will observe the opinion which is expressed in answer to the question.

*Mr. JAMES LOWTHER: Will the list be published of those commanding officers who disregard it?

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Can the hon. Gentleman say whether the Messrs. Samuel mentioned are the firm who sold boots made out of newspapers?

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: Is it not a fact that Lord Wolseley has been handed a list of letters from commanding officers declining to obey the War Office?

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: May I put a relevant question? May I ask whether it is not the fact that these commanding officers expend public money, and has not the War Office control over them?

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is arguing on the answer. The question on the Paper has been fully answered.

NAVAL TRAINING SHIPS—THE SCOTTISH COAST.

Mr. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the strong local feeling recently expressed in favour of the establishment of a naval training ship at a suitable station upon the west coast of Scotland, and to the fact that the nearest available training ship station at present is Queensferry, he will consider whether he can spare at least some inexpensive vessel which would serve as a training ship for youths of hardy physique and inured by the habits and circumstances of their lives to seafaring.

Mr. GOSCHEN: I can only repeat what I have frequently said in reply to the questions of hon. Members, that there is no intention of adding to the number of training ships for the Navy. The present number is such as the Naval Service requires. There is no such thing as an inexpensive training ship. It involves considerable establishment expenses both ashore and afloat.

NAVAL COURTS-MARTIAL.

Mr. H. D. GREENE (Shrewsbury): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Criminal Evidence Act has been applied to courts-martial under the Naval Discipline Act, so as to enable sailors charged with offences to give evidence in their own defence, or whether it is intended to withhold from Her Majesty's Naval Forces this privilege which has been extended to civilians and soldiers since 1898.

Mr. GOSCHEN: There has been a great objection to change well-established custom in the proceedings of Naval courts-martial. No steps have yet been taken to apply to them the rules of the Criminal Evidence Act, but I will consult my Naval colleagues on the subject.

LINOLEUM FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. DALZIEL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is now able to say if a higher standard of linoleum will be adopted for use on Her Majesty's fleet; and whether precautions will be taken to ensure that in each case the quality supplied is equal to the sample submitted.

The SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, N.): No complaints have recently been received as to the description or quality of linoleum received, and there is no reason to suppose that the quality supplied is not equal to the sample submitted. I may add that orders have been given for trials to be made of a thicker quality of linoleum, and it will depend on the results whether or no such a quality should be adopted.

PARIS EXHIBITION—BRITISH SECTION.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in view of the fact that £125,000 has been granted by Parliament in aid of expenses for the British section of the Paris Exhibition, is he aware that the Manor House, in the Rue des Nations of the Exhibition, is only open for a few hours during the day, and that visitors have to be provided with a special ticket; and will he use his influence with the authorities, so that the general public may be able to obtain ready access to the Manor House during the hours similar buildings are open to the public.

*MR. BRODRICK: The matter is not one that falls within the province of the Foreign Office. Questions of organisation in connection with the British section of the Paris Exhibition are under the control of Colonel Jekyll, C.M.G., the secretary to the Royal Commission.

GAMBLING IN FUTURES IN GRAIN.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the recent report from Germany showing how the law against gambling in futures in grain has operated, the Board of Trade will consider the advisability of introducing similar regulations regarding options in food supplies in this country.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): There is no intention to introduce legislation of the kind referred to in the hon. Member's question.

THE SCARCITY OF SPRATS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, is he aware that there has been a scarcity of sprats in the seas adjacent to the United Kingdom during the last ten years, and can he state what is the cause of this scarcity; and if not, will he take steps to inquire into its cause, or will he, without inquiry, introduce legislation tending to bring the scarcity to an end.

MR. RITCHIE: The returns of the quantities of sprats taken from year to year show great fluctuations, owing to many causes, including the state of the weather, but the returns before 1890 are not sufficiently complete to enable me to compare the last ten years with the previous ten years. The average annual quantity for the five years ending 1899 is in excess of that for the previous five years. I have no reason to think that an inquiry would lead to any useful result or that legislation on the subject is desirable.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Will the right hon. Gentleman refer this matter to the Undersized Fish Bill Committee?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The right hon. Gentleman has failed to answer the part of my question as to the cause of the scarcity. He must know what the cause is.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member is quite as likely to know as I am.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is it due to the fact that large quantities of "sardines" are consumed in this country?

THE TRUCK ACT—POSITION OF FEMALE WORKERS.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps can be taken in reference to a case heard in the Queen's Bench Division at Dublin, last week, in which it was held that a woman sock-maker was not a workman under the Truck Act; whether, by this judgment, the view uniformly taken by the Home Office is reversed; whether the judgment will have effect in England or Scotland; and if he will consider whether the Irish decision goes beyond the Truck Acts, and affects the definitions in the Factory and Workshop Acts.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The Court of Queen's Bench Division in Ireland, I am informed, decided the case referred to on the ground that knitting was not manual labour within the meaning of the Truck Act of 1887. If this is so, it is contrary to the view upon which the Truck Acts have hitherto been administered, without any similar question, so far as I know, being raised in any court. It would also have a very serious effect upon the administration of the Factory Acts in which similar language is used. I regard the question as so serious that I propose to consult at once with the Law Officers of the Crown as to the effect and extent of the decision of the Irish Court, and as to the proper steps to be taken to secure the effective administration of the Truck and Factory Acts.

PROSECUTIONS BY FACTORY INSPECTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, by direction of the Home Office, female factory inspectors have been sent to Donegal on several occasions, and have instituted legal proceedings against employers in poor districts, where, until local industry was started, emigration was the only resource of the population; what has been the result of those prosecutions, and what expense have they and the visits of the female inspectors entailed on the State; is he aware that, after the dismissal of a recent prosecution under the Truck Act, the Government obtained a mandamus to compel the magistrates to state a case, and the resident magistrate, Mr. Gaussen, B.L., put it in his pocket and took it away to a town thirty miles off, and wrote from thence a letter refusing to return the writ to his brother justices; is he aware that when the majority of the magistrates were thus disabled from complying with the Queen's writ, the Crown solicitor, without informing the High Court of the facts, applied for a writ of attachment against the magistrates for alleged contempt; and that the magistrates were obliged to show cause at great expense to themselves, two of them, Major Johnson and Mr. Boyle, proceeding to Dublin to instruct counsel; is he aware that the Lord Chief Baron, in delivering the unanimous judgment of the Queen's Bench refusing the attachment, declared that he was shocked at the conduct of the Crown solicitor, and expressed regret that the law did not allow costs to be awarded to the justices; and that the High Court subsequently decided that the majority of the magistrates were right in dismissing the prosecution under the Truck Act, and awarded costs to the defendant therein; and will the justices, whose personal conduct and legal decision have now been vindicated, be recouped their outlay in resisting the Conditional Order for attachment.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The hon. Member's question contains suggestions which I cannot accept as an accurate representation of the facts of the cases referred to. But it is true that, owing to the existence of grave abuses on the part of employers in some parts of Donegal, it has been found necessary to take proceedings for the protection of the women who work for them. In some of the cases taken, convictions were obtained and fines imposed. The expenses involved are part of the ordinary cost of the Factory Department. In the case particularly referred to by the hon. Member, the Court did not decide that the magistrates were right in their reasons for dismissing the case; in fact, they said they were wrong, and the ground upon which the Court dismissed the appeal was an entirely different point of law, which I have already explained in the answer which I have just given to the right hon. Baronet. As to that part of the question which relates to the action of the resident magistrate, the Crown solicitor, and the justices, I must refer the hon. Member to the Irish Government.

LAW COURTS—PROPOSED NEW BUILDINGS.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will state the nature of the buildings which it is proposed to erect on the open space to the west of the Law Courts; and whether, considering the æsthetic and hygienic value of this open space, which was laid out at the expense of the late Mr. William Henry Smith, any scheme to erect the proposed building elsewhere could be favourably considered.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): The buildings to be erected on the vacant site to the west of the Law Courts are four new courts and their adjuncts, which will form part of the Royal Courts of Justice, and must be in structural communication therewith. The extension will occupy about one-sixth of the area of vacant ground which was temporarily laid out as a garden by the generosity of Mr. Smith, but was acquired and always intended for an extension of the courts when needed. As the essential object in view in the erection of the Royal Courts of Justice was the concentration of the legal business of the country, the Government could not view favourably my noble friend's suggestion to erect additional courts elsewhere.

HIGH WYCOMBE POST OFFICE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the negotiations that have been proceeding between the Post Office and the authorities of High Wycombe regarding the erection of the new post office in a convenient position; and whether, seeing that the said authorities agreed to relieve the Post Office of the selected site called Flint House, and subsequently agreed to further conditions required by the Post Office which involved a local contribution of upwards of £1,200, the Postmaster General will reconsider the proposal now made to the High Wycombe authorities, calling on them to obtain the extension of the lease of the present premises, and will proceed with the erection of the new post office on the site chosen without delay.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the representations made by those who desire that the new post office in High Wycombe should be placed not at Flint House as authorised, but in a new street which it is proposed to form; but after giving the fullest consideration to the matter, he has decided to proceed with the Flint House scheme. Apart from other considerations it now appears that while the new street cannot be formed for some time, the tenancy of the present post office, which expires at Michaelmas next, cannot be extended, as it was understood it would be.

IRISH LANGUAGE IN IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what arrangements are to be made for the study of the Irish language in Irish National schools, and especially in the Irish-speaking districts.

MR. FLAVIN: At the same time, may I ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists in certain districts in Ireland owing to the discrepancies which exist in results in National schools between the years 1898 and 1899; and whether, owing to the alleged grievances of National school teachers, he will consider the advisability of consulting with them as to the fairness of taking an average, as a means of ascertaining their future salaries, of the years 1897, 1898, and 1899?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): This question has been referred to the Board of National Education, and I am informed that a statement to enable me to reply to it cannot be sent until after their meeting on the 17th instant.

MR. FLYNN: Will the teachers be consulted before the Board of Education come to a decision on the subject?

DUBLIN NATIONAL MUSEUM—THE MIAS TIERNAN.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will make inquiry as to the possibility of procuring for the National Museum in Dublin the Mias Tiernan, now in the custody of the Accountant General for Ireland in the matter of the Knox Estate.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I understand that the historical relic referred to in the question is claimed by the executors of the late Dr. Knox, whose estate is being administered in the Chancery Division of the High Court, to be part of the assets of the testator. The relic is in the custody of the Accountant General pursuant to an order of the judge, who has not, so far, made an order for its sale.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—SALARIES.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps the Government intend to take with reference to the increases in the salaries of certain county council officials in Ireland made by the Irish Local Government Board, and which several Irish county councils have refused to pay on the grounds that the salaries as increased are too high and that the views of the county councils in relation to these increases have not been properly consulted by the Local Government Board; and will he also say what steps are to be taken with reference to the qualifications for deputy county surveyor, fixed by the Local Government Board, to which exception has been taken.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: In every case where the county council decline to pay their existing officers the amount of the allowance determined by the Local Government Board under Section 115, Sub-section 18, of the Act of 1898 for their increased work under the Act, the Board intend to make special Orders under seal in order to enable these officers to recover in a court of law the sums to which they are entitled under the provisions of the Act referred to. It is quite incorrect to say that the councils were not consulted with reference to these increases, and this assertion is chiefly put forward by certain councils who took no steps to come to an agreement with their officers on receipt of the Board's letters inviting their views. I may observe that the salaries for new assistant surveyors which have been fixed by the councils themselves since the passing of the Act have, in many cases, been equal to the scale fixed by the Board. The qualifications fixed for assistant surveyors have, I understand, been generally approved of. So far only one objection has been received. One examination has been held, at which nine elected assistant surveyors were examined, with the result that seven were certified to possess the prescribed qualifications and two were rejected.

MR. FLYNN: In case of any difference of opinion with regard to salaries between a county council and the Irish Local Government Board, has the latter an absolute right to fix the salary?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is not merely a right. The duty is imposed on them.

MR. FLAVIN: Can they fix any salary they please?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This matter was discussed for several hours on the Vote for the Local Government Board, and I really cannot re-open it.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board have addressed a letter to the South Tipperary County Council stating that they had received a letter from Mr. Higgins, solicitor for Mr. Haskett, the late surveyor of South Tipperary, stating that his client had been obliged to take proceedings against the council for the balance of his salary, at the rate of £800 a year, and that, to enable Mr. Haskett to succeed in his action they (the Local Government Board) had issued a special sealed Order; and will he state who fixed Mr. Haskett's salary at £800 a year; was this salary approved of by the council; and what is the nature of the special sealed Order issued in support of Mr. Haskett's action.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Mr. Haskett is still the county surveyor. The county council proposed to grant Mr. Haskett an addition of £100 a year to his salary of £600, in respect of his increase of duties. The county surveyor, not agreeing to this proposal, appealed under Section 115, Sub-section 18, of the Act of 1898 to the Local Government Board to determine the increase to be allowed to him, claiming an addition of £450 a year to his salary. After careful consideration of the additional duties to be performed by him, and of the proposal of the county council, the Board decided that the county surveyor was entitled to an addition of £200 a year to his salary, making a total salary of £800 a year, and they informed the council accordingly. The council, however, declined to pay more than the sum proposed by them, namely, £700 a year, and the county surveyor applied to the Board, through his solicitor, for an Order under seal to enable him to recover the amount due to him according to the Board's decision, and the Board have complied with his request.

MR. DILLON: What was the nature of the special sealed Order? Will the right hon. Gentleman lay a copy of it on the Table?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not know that there is any objection to doing it. It is a simple Order fixing the salary.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BODIES—PROSECUTION FOR VOTING WHEN DISQUALIFIED.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will grant a Return giving the names of persons convicted, since the Local Government (Ireland) Act came into operation, of having acted or voted as members of county or district councils or boards of guardians when disqualified under the orders issued by virtue of the Act, showing the names of the prosecutors, the number of offences alleged against each defendant in the summons, the amount of the fine or penalty inflicted for each offence, and the date of the conviction by the court of summary jurisdiction.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There is no official record of the prosecutions referred to, but the information could, of course, be obtained from the clerks of petty sessions. If the hon. Member so desires I will have the Return put in hand, and will forward it to him when completed.

DOWNPATRICK DISTURBANCES.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a sworn statement from Downpatrick supporting the allegations made, in the letter of the Deputy District Master of Lecale, concerning the action of the police on the 5th June; and what action is proposed to be taken to ascertain the circumstances of the case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have received the document referred to in the first paragraph. It has been brought under the notice of the Constabulary authorities, who adhere to the accuracy of the statement already made by me that the Orangemen have not been in the habit of returning through Irish Street. I may mention that the county inspector convened a meeting of the magistrates to discuss the propriety of allowing processionists to march through the street in question, and they are unanimously of opinion that permission should not be given. I have already stated that prosecutions are pending against a number of persons for assaults on the police arising out of the disturbances in Downpatrick on the 5th June, and that all the facts will doubtless be fully investigated by the magistrates.

*MR. T. D. SULLIVAN: Who and what is the Deputy District Master of Lecale? Is it an official title?

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY REGULATIONS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland can he state the degree of relationship laid down by the Code within which members of the Royal Irish Constabulary may not perform duties in towns or districts where they have friends residing; and will cases brought to his notice where the provision of the Code has been ignored have his attention.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There is no fixed rule laid down in the Code with respect to the degree of relationship. In answer to the second paragraph, if any specific case is brought under notice it will be carefully inquired into by the Inspector General.

REPAIR OF IRISH ROADS.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the desirability of inserting a clause in the Local Government (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill with a view to empower councils to undertake the maintenance and repair of roads by means of direct labour, as provided in the English Local Government Act.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The object of the hon. and gallant Member could be accomplished, if thought desirable, by means of a Provisional Order under the Local Government (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill now awaiting Second Reading.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Will steps be taken in that direction?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am not prepared to answer that.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS IN KERRY.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he can state the amount of money which has been spent by the Congested Districts Board in the county of Kerry for each of the years 1897, 1898, and 1899, and also say in what particular districts of Kerry during the years mentioned the money was spent, giving the amount so spent for each district or place in the county.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Congested Districts Board have no record showing the total sum expended in each of the congested districts. The preparation of such a Return would entail a considerable amount of trouble, and would not, in my opinion, serve any useful purpose. The annual reports presented to Parliament give a great deal of information as to the several localities where the Board's operations have been carried on during the period referred to.

MR. FLAVIN: Cannot the right hon. Gentleman give the gross amount for each of the years named?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I see no object to be served by doing so.

BELFAST WATER SUPPLY.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Belfast Water Commissioners obtained powers from Parliament to take certain lands in the townland of Oldpark, parish of Shankhill, county Antrim, and served the requisite notices on owners and occupiers of land in 1896, and that Mr. Ryan, the arbitrator, held his first court in 1899, but has not yet made his final award; whether he is aware that Mr. Ryan in one case awarded £2,000 more than the owner of the property claimed, and that in other cases his awards were below the value of the lands as sworn to by the Water Commissioners' valuers; and whether he is aware that in consequence of the delay in the publication of the final awards the owners and occupiers have suffered loss, as they have been obliged to pay the rent of their holdings, and debarred from developing or disposing of their lands, and can he state how the appointment of Mr. Ryan as arbitrator was made, and when the final award will be delivered.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I understand the facts are as stated in the first paragraph. The Board of Public Works have no knowledge as to the matters alleged in the second paragraph. If the parties are aggrieved at the award of the arbitrator it is open to them to enter a traverse at the assizes. Nor have the Board any information as to the matters referred to in the first part of the last paragraph. The appointment of the arbitrator was made by the Board of Public Works. In the case under the Belfast Water Act of 1897, in which the arbitrator was appointed in February, 1899, it is understood that his final award is in print, and will be lodged in the course of a week or two. In the case under the Act of last year it cannot be stated when the final award will be delivered.

MONAGHAN PETTY SESSIONS APPEALS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that at a recent Petty Sessions Court in Monaghan two men named M'Guigan and Hughes were convicted of a police offence and sent to Armagh Gaol for nine months and five months respectively, and that several magistrates, not in the habit of attending the Monaghan Petty Sessions, appeared on the bench on this occasion and adjudicated upon the trial of these men; is he aware that, after being placed in Armagh Gaol, M'Guigan and Hughes lodged an appeal against their conviction and sentence, and gave the necessary bail for its prosecution; and that when they appeared at the Monaghan Quarter Sessions, the County Court Judge, at the instance of the Crown, refused them the right of appeal, and sent them back to gaol to complete their sentence; and will he either secure that these men be granted the right of appeal, or take steps to have their punishment reduced.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am informed that all the justices who attended the Monaghan Petty Sessions at which the convictions mentioned in the first paragraph were obtained, are in the habit of attending the sessions, except one gentleman who was present for the first time since his appointment to the Commission a few days previously. Under the Petty Sessions Act, an appellant is bound to give seven days notice of his intention to appeal, but this the defendants in the present case failed to do, giving only three days notice, and the Judge held that the appeal was not properly before him. If the defendants feel aggrieved by the decision of the Judge, it is open to them to have that decision reviewed by the Court of Queen's Bench.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now make a statement of the intentions of the Government as to the legislative business of the remaining weeks of the session; and, if not, when he will be in a position to make such a statement.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it would be premature now to answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman. If he will kindly put it down for Monday next, I hope then to be able to make a full statement.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman meantime take into consideration the view expressed in the House of Lords on Friday as to the desirability of withdrawing the Tithe Rent-charge (Ireland) Bill, and devoting the time to some more useful purpose?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What Estimates will be taken on Friday next, and what will be the course of business till then?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I suppose we shall finish the Committee stage of the Irish Tithes Bill to-night, and I shall then propose to proceed with the Agricultural Holdings Bill of my right hon. friend. I hope to take the Navy Estimates on Friday. The First Lord of the Admiralty, however, informs me that it is very important that a Memorandum which he has prepared on the subject of water-tube boilers should be in the hands of Members before those Estimates can well be discussed, and there appears to be a slight doubt as to whether it will be possible to circulate that Memorandum in time. But, if possible, it is most desirable to take the Navy Estimates on Friday.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: If you do not, what Vote will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Failing the Navy Estimates, the Home Office Vote will be taken.

MR. DILLON: Up to what hour to-morrow morning does the right hon. Gentleman propose to keep the House sitting?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That depends on hon. Gentlemen opposite.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT SURVEYORS (WEXFORD) — ACTION OF IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD.

[MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.]

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, West Division) rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, "the recent action of the Local Government Board for Ireland in raising the salaries and qualifications of the county and district surveyors in county Wexford, and in endeavouring to enforce the payment of these increased salaries as from to-morrow, by sealed order, notwithstanding the protests of the county council.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): As a question of order, may I ask whether this can be a matter of urgent public importance, seeing that the question was fully discussed on the Vote for the Irish Local Government Board more than a month ago? † I do not see how, under the circumstances, it can properly be regarded as urgent.

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: The sealed Order is to come in force to-morrow.

*MR. SPEAKER: Theoretically and in fact I have no knowledge of what was said in Committee of Supply.

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: The Government are attempting to coerce the Irish county councils by means of a sealed Order.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think I can take upon myself to rule that the motion cannot be moved.

MR. SPEAKER then called on those Members who supported the motion to rise in their places, and not less than forty Members having accordingly risen—

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I have to thank hon. Members who have been good enough to give me their support in this matter, and at the same time I wish to express my regret at having to deal with this question in this particular way. But under existing Parliamentary conditions it is absolutely impossible for Irish Members to deal with important Irish questions as they arise. It is quite impossible to deal with important Irish matters in the two or three days allotted to Irish Estimates. If I must put the House to inconvenience on this occasion hon. Members must blame the system under which Irish affairs are managed in England, and I hope, therefore, I shall not be blamed for standing between the House and the more interesting debates on the Tithes Bill. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, in answer to several questions addressed to him to-day, gave the House the views of the Irish Local Government Board on the situation which has arisen in Ireland with regard to the action of that Board towards the Irish county councils in increasing the salaries of the county officials. Listening to the answers of the right hon. Gentleman I could not help thinking how utterly he failed to realise the very serious position which has been created in Ireland within the last few weeks. The action of the Local Government Board in raising the salary of certain county council officials has given great dissatisfaction not only to members of county councils, but also to the constituencies they represent, and the ratepayers at large have not hesitated to express to their county councils the extreme dissatisfaction with which they view the rapid increase of rates all over the country. I am chairman of a county council, a district council, and a board of guardians, and during the last twelve months the expenditure of each of those bodies has considerably increased, the increase being mainly due to the action of the Local Government Board in ordering us to do this and to pay that. It appears there is no escape from an Order of the Local Government Board—there is no way of protecting the ratepayers. It has, therefore, become necessary that we should again direct public attention to this matter, and endeavour to obtain the assistance of this House in guarding the interests of the Irish taxpayers against the unjust interference of the Local Government Board. I do not propose, and you, Sir, would not allow me, to deal in generalities; I wish to direct attention to the specific case of the treatment of the County Council of Wexford. It is necessary under the terms of my motion that I should adopt this course; but I may point out that other Irish county councils stand in precisely the same position. In county Wexford there is a road mileage, excluding the roads in urban districts, of 1,982 miles. For the management of that mileage we have a county surveyor, whose salary we are ordered by the Local Government Board to increase by 33 per cent. This gentleman heretofore has had a salary of £650 a year, and that was considered ample for the work he has to discharge. We have also four deputy surveyors, whose salaries we are commanded to increase by 87½ per cent. The old salaries were £80 a year, and they were considered quite sufficient for the work to be performed, the best proof of which is that whenever a vacancy occurred there were dozens of applicants for the position. In addition to these increases of salaries, we are also ordered to appoint an additional assistant surveyor at a salary of £150 a year. Seeing that during all the years of grand jury management the county managed to get along with a county surveyor at £650, and four assistant surveyors at £80 a year, it will be interesting to know why it is suddenly found necessary, as soon as the people have obtained control of the local administration, to increase the salaries to this large extent and to employ additional officials. This question has been in debate between the County Council of Wexford and the Local Government Board for some time; we have protested against the decision of the Local Government Board, and given the reasons upon which we based that protest, but our protest has been disregarded and our arguments apparently refused a hearing. Now, as a climax, the Local Government Board issue a sealed Order to compel us to submit to their decision in this matter. The Chief Secretary will no doubt explain the meaning of a sealed Order and what it purports to be. As perhaps the perfect accuracy of my version of the story might be suspected, I must trouble the House with some correspondence which has passed between the County Council of Wexford and the Irish Local Government Board. The first act in this performance was the receipt by the secretary of the county council of a circular from the Local Government Board. The circular is dated 29th August, 1899, and numbered 317, so I presume it was the 317th circular we received from the Board between the 1st April and the 29th August last. This circular was sent to the secretary, although some time before the general council of the Irish County Councils had made a request that when an important circular was issued a copy should be sent to every member of the county council interested, because it frequently happened that, owing to the extreme pressure of bringing the Local Government Act into operation, and the great difficulty of dealing with the enormous number of circulars issued, matters of importance escaped the notice of the county councils in consequence of the circulars being sent only to the secretaries. I will take the liberty of reading this circular to the House—

"The Local Government Board for Ireland desire to draw the attention of the county council to the terms of Section 115, Sub-section 18, of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, which provide that existing officers transferred under the section shall receive such increase or diminution of remuneration in proportion to the increase or diminution of the duties as the Local Government Board may determine, and that the county council, with the approval of the Board, may make a special agreement with any of their officers in the matter. To enable them to discharge the duty thus imposed upon them, the Board will be glad to receive, within three months from the present date, a statement showing the salaries of the secretary, county surveyors, assistant surveyors, and other officers of the council who are affected by the provisions of the sub-section referred to, and who have not made a special agreement with the council on the subject, together with a statement as to the increase or diminution of work to be taken into account in each case. Any observations which the council may see fit to make respecting the claims of their officers under the enactment in question will receive full consideration on the part of the Board."

I may point out that very often these circulars and letters from the Local Government Board arrive just after the meeting of the county council has been held, and considerable time may elapse before the matters are brought to the attention of the council and considered. Last year was the opening year of the local administration in Ireland—a year which gave those entrusted with the administration of local affairs a very great amount of work to do. I am sure the House will agree that it would be perfectly impossible to expect members of county councils, who are unpaid, who are not rich men, who have their own business to manage, who have to support themselves and their families by their own industry, to attend permanently for the purpose of discharging public duties in the county councils. When this circular was issued the Local Government Act had been four or five months in operation, and the whole machinery of local government in Ireland had been put into working order all over the country: That had entailed incessant labour on the part of county councils; there had been constant meetings of the councils and their committees, and at the end of those four or five months the Wexford County Council considered they were entitled to a holiday. This circular was issued in August, but I do not know when the county council met to consider it, as I was abroad at the time. I know that when I left Ireland I had not the least idea that any increase of salaries had been demanded by any of our officials, and I do not know at all when the circular was first brought to the notice of the council. Surely a circular of this importance ought to have been brought more prominently before public notice than was the case. The county council met in—I believe—November, and the circular was laid before them. They very properly decided to leave the matter open until it was seen what other county councils were doing in the matter. They instructed their finance committee to investigate and report. All this time there was absolutely no communication whatever with the Local Government Board, who knew when the county councils met, and it was their business to draw the attention of the county councils to that circular. Nobody thought this question would be decided in camera. A great many of us were prepared to leave the matter in the hands of the Local Government Board, thinking that they would communicate with us, and ask for information upon various points. We never believed that they would take upon themselves the responsibility of deciding the question in opposition to the interests of the ratepayers. The finance committee met on 22nd November, and recommended that the county surveyor's salary should be £600 a year, and that he be allowed £50 for expenses. The old grand jury considered that the salary of the county surveyor was too high, and the council agreed with that view, for they considered that the existing salaries were quite large enough, and they simply adopted the existing salaries as the basis for making a reasonable compromise. All this time no specific demand was made by the officials. We never had any demand by the officials for any specific salary, and it was absolutely impossible for us to name any specific sum under the circumstances. All this time the Local Government Board gave us no information, and the county councils were under the impression that the Local Government Board were giving the matter proper consideration, and consequently no action was taken by the county councils. What happened next was that we received a most extraordinary communication from the Local Government Board on the 7th February, 1900, as follows—

"SIR,—I am directed by the Local Government Board for Ireland to inform you that they have had under consideration the claims for increased remuneration for increased duties made to them under Sections 115 (18) of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, by the county surveyors who have failed to come to an agreement with the county councils on the matter.

"The Board have carefully considered all representations which have been received by them from the county councils and their officers in response to their circular of the 29th August upon this subject, and they have also had before them a memorandum prepared by the county surveyors, showing the nature of the increased duties devolving upon them under the Act.

"The Board observe that the surveyors contend that their travelling expenses are largely increased owing to their having to attend the meetings and adjourned meetings of the county and district councils, and to make quarterly inspections for contractors' payments.

"They also represent that their additional work in connection with their new duties, including the preparation of plans and specifications and quarterly reports for the district councils, will practically occupy their entire time, so that their private practice must necessarily fall off, and will no longer be the same source of income to them which it has been in the past."

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot conceive that the hon. Member is keeping within the terms of the leave given by the House. I understand that the hon. Gentleman proposed to call attention to some recent action of the Local Government Board, and he is not entitled to discuss the whole proceedings of the Local Government Board in Ireland with the county council of Wexford, extending over many months, and many months before the date on which the matter took place in respect of which the hon. Gentleman has moved the adjournment of the House. That appears to me to be going entirely beyond the definite matter of urgent public importance to which I understand the hon. Gentleman desires to call attention. I understand that some question has recently arisen in respect of some appointment by the Local Government Board in the county of Wexford, but that does not entitle the hon. Member to discuss the whole history of the proceedings of that Board for many months past and to read a lengthy correspondence between the Board and the county council of Wexford. The hon. Member must endeavour to keep to the terms of his leave.

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: Of course, I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but my object really was to strengthen the case against myself. My object in reading this correspondence was to argue the case from the Local Government Board point of view. However, I will not deal with this question of the Local Government Board circulars, although I was anxious to put before the House the replies of the county council to the last circular from the Local Government Board. The county council drew up a detailed reply to every single point raised by the Local Government Board, and to every single point raised by the county surveyors. The next thing was that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland was approached, and he was asked to receive a deputation from the Irish councils generally, in order that they might lay their views before him upon this matter, as they could not get any hearing from the Local Government Board. That request was refused by the right hon. Gentleman. I am perfectly aware that at the time he was not very strong, but I think it was unfortunate that the deputation was not received.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member not to repeat the arguments which were used during the discussion of this subject upon the Estimates. The hon. Member must refer only to some recent urgent matter of public importance which has occurred since that time.

*SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I have only to say that the right hon. Gentleman could not receive that deputation because the matter had been discussed on the Estimates. It is much to be regretted that we could not come to some understanding, for the county council had not the smallest intention of refusing to pay reasonable salaries to their officials. All they wanted was that their case should be heard, and that the Local Government Board should take into consideration what was urged on the other side. If salaries were honestly due to the officials we should pay them with the greatest of pleasure, but what we contend is that definite steps ought to have been taken to consider the views of the county councils upon this matter before it was decided. Unquestionably, the views of the county councils have not been properly considered, and all we ask is that they should be considered. The resolutions passed by the Wexford County Council make it perfectly clear that we are prepared to pay fitting salaries to our officers, and to pay for any increased work which devolves upon them owing to the working of the Local Government Act; but what we say is that our side of the question has not been properly considered. The Local Government Board have retaliated by issuing a sealed Order, and that Order, I understand, comes before my county council to-morrow. I will therefore take the responsibility of advising the county council to postpone its consideration for a little longer in order that the Government may be able to find a way out of the difficulty. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland realises fully the seriousness of the position. The Act of Parliament does not say that the Local Government Board should give greater salaries than ought to be given, but it says that they should award such salaries as are fit and proper. I would like to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman the seriousness of the position. In what I have said I have been careful to say nothing at which he can take offence. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has been ruling Ireland now for four or five years, and probably he will agree with me that during all that time the county of Wexford has given him perhaps less trouble than any other county in Ireland. I think that even the Local Government Board for Ireland will admit that the various local boards in the county of Wexford have given them as little trouble as any other public boards in any other part of the country. The people of the county of Wexford feel very strongly upon this question. They are not an excitable people; they are a peaceful people; they are a quiet people; they are an industrious people. All they ask is to be allowed to do their own business in their own way. But they will stand dictation from nobody. The Chief Secretary may not understand the character of the Wexford people. There is nothing theatrical about them. But they have this peculiarity that they mean what they say, and, if they must fight, they will fight. What the council demand is to be allowed to do their own work in their own way; and, although they are not particularly anxious to fight this question, and would prefer that it should be settled amicably, I take the liberty of telling the right hon. Gentleman and the Irish Government that, if this matter is pushed to extremes, Wexford will fight. The right hon. Gentleman does not know much about that part of Ireland; but if he insists on this Order I am afraid there will be considerable trouble not only in Wexford, but in other counties also. I would take the liberty of suggesting to the right hon. Gentleman, in a perfectly friendly spirit, that he should endeavour to find a way out of the difficulty. All that the county council desire is that their case should be given reasonable consideration. It is no use pointing to Acts of Parliament and to the solitary circular which was issued. Knowing the feeling in the county, I can say that unless ordinary courtesy is extended to the county council not a single member of it will consent to pay a farthing of these increased salaries; and there is not a Nationalist in the county, and I doubt if there are very many Unionists, who will not support the council in that attitude. For political purposes it might be just as well if we had a new casus belli against the Irish Government. Individually I am desirous of saving my own county from the anxieties and the sacrifices which a new war in Ireland would entail; and therefore, knowing the extreme gravity of the situation, I have taken the unusual course of moving the adjournment for the purpose of endeavouring to induce the Chief Secretary to find a golden bridge out of the difficulty, and make peace while he may. There is nothing in the Act of Parliament to prevent the right hon. Gentleman settling the matter in a reasonable manner, and if the right hon. Gentleman chooses to carry it to extremes his is the responsibility. It might be as well for political reasons if the Local Government Board declared war on the county councils in Ireland, because it would give us a common ground of action against the Government which would cause us to forget our own differences. Whatever may be the decision of the Government is absolutely indifferent to me. In conclusion, I will only say that Wexford is prepared to fight the matter out if necessary, and is determined not to tolerate such interference from the Local Government Board. Hence I offer the suggestion to the Chief Secretary that he should take steps to preserve peace before it is too late.

Sir Thomas Esmonde.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): In seconding the motion of the hon. Baronet, I desire to say, at the outset, that I think that the Chief Secretary was rather ill-advised in endeavouring to shut up discussion on this subject. It is really a most important question which the Local Government Board have wantonly and arbitrarily forced on the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman is aware that local taxation in Ireland is much higher than in England. But the Local Government Board are increasing the rates at such a speed that really the county councils are very likely to break down under the burden that is being imposed on them. I am aware that in the Act of 1898 there is a clause—and this will be the answer of the Chief Secretary—to the effect that the Local Government Board can raise salaries if the county councils will not do it, and if the duties of the existing officers have been increased. But who is the best judge of whether the duties have increased or not? The county councils ought to be the best judges, but the Local Government Board will not allow that right of judgment, and they insist on saying that the duties of such and such an official have been increased by the Act.

*MR. SPEAKER: It may be I was somewhat premature in allowing this matter to be raised on a motion for the adjournment; but at any rate, the hon. Member must confine himself to a definite matter of urgent public importance. I must say that, judging from the arguments addressed to the House, it appears as if an endeavour is being made to argue the general question of the policy of the Local Government Board under the powers given to them by the Act of 1898. That would be out of order, because it would not be within the terms of the motion, and it would be discussing a general matter which could not be said to be in any way urgent, although it may be important. Therefore the hon. Member must endeavour to confine himself to the terms of the motion. I certainly understood that an attempt would be made to show that there are specific circumstances in the county of Wexford to which it is desirable to call attention without delay, not an attempt to discuss the same general matter which was, as I understand, discussed on the Estimates—the policy of the Local Government Board in exercising the powers given them by the Act of 1898.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I had no desire to go outside the limits of the motion, but I understand, and I believe that the Chief Secretary is also aware, that these increases of salaries have been going on since May 24th, the date on which the Estimates referred to were discussed in this House. If these increases had been stopped after that date there would certainly have been no ground for this motion, but the practice continues.

*MR. SPEAKER: The practice, as I understand, existed before 24th May, and has been continued since. It is therefore a continuous policy which was discussed on the Estimates, and that policy cannot be discussed on the motion before the House.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: It is since then that this Sealed Order system was inaugurated, a system to which the Irish people are quite unaccustomed, and for that reason the hon. Gentleman is perfectly entitled to bring forward his motion. The Local Government Board had no right to exercise their judgment as regards increases of salary; that duty belongs to the county councils. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that Wexford is determined to resist this attempt to impose additional taxation on them which they cannot bear, and I trust that not only the Wexford County Council, but every county council in Ireland, will fight the Local Government Board out to the very end, and that they will not allow the Board to impose exorbitant rates on them, which they have been endeavouring to do since the Act came into operation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I certainly think that the House will agree with me that this motion is the most extraordinary abuse of the rules of the House that we have ever heard of. It was perfectly obvious from the speeches of the mover and seconder that their desire was to bring forward a question which had taken an entire evening when the Vote for the Local Government Board was under consideration, but by your ruling, Sir, they have been prevented from doing that. What is there left to answer? One thing, and one thing only, and that is the action of the Board in issuing sealed Orders. The hon. Member talked as if the sealed Order system was a new thing. That system has been going on for the last fifty years.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Not in this connection.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Let me explain why a sealed Order was issued in this case. The Local Government Board, acting under the powers and duties imposed upon them by the Act, made these Orders in connection with the salaries of existing officers. The county council refused to carry them out, and the matter then became one between the officer in whose interest the Order had been issued on the one side, and the county council on the other. His redress, if the county council refuse to give him the increase of salary to which the Board had declared he was entitled, is to sue them before a court, and in the absence of a sealed Order there would be no evidence that the Local Government Board had made the Order as to salaries. It was in order to enable the officer to proceed that the sealed Order was issued.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): The Chief Secretary states in his high and mighty fashion that the system of sealed Orders has been in force in Ireland for fifty years, but that system—and a very tyrannical system it is—has only been enforced against inferior local bodies—namely, the boards of guardians. That system has been put in force on this occasion, for the first time, against a county council in Ireland. And when the right hon. Gentleman says that this system of sealed Orders has been in force for fifty years, I would put this question to him: Was it ever enforced against the grand juries in Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, London derry, N.): The Local Government Board can make no valid Order except under seal.

MR. DILLON: That is a question of a technicality—that the Order made is described as a sealed Order. But the object is to coerce and compel, and to furnish the machinery to coerce and compel, the county council to pay this officer a bigger salary than they are willing to do. It may be that the principle of the matter was discussed before; but now we have come to machinery, to the fresh assertion of powers by the Local Government Board against the county councils, who are the legitimate successors of the grand juries, and no such power was ever attempted to be put in force against them. There was no jurisdiction against the grand juries, and that is our point. Why are the representatives of the people, who have now come into power, to be compelled by this most oppressive and coercive jurisdiction to do what the old grand juries were never sought to be compelled to do? It is a most monstrous exercise of power. The right hon. Gentleman tried to run away from this case by making out that our mouths should be closed on this occasion because we have debated the subject on the Local Government Board Vote. He utterly misstated the case when he said that the Local Government Board had no alternative but to proceed by this method of sealed Order, and authorise officials to take action against their own employers. That is not true. The Local Government Board had an alternative. Recollect what happened in the debate on the Irish Estimates. From all sides—equally from that as from this side of the House—there came a protest from the Irish Members against the exercise of this discretion by the Local Government Board, and we were entitled to expect, as a result of that debate in May last, that the Local Government Board, instead of rushing without hesitation to this extreme course of action, which is sure to embroil them in a row, would invite from the county councils a full statement of the grounds on which they object to the increase of the salaries. At all events, they were bound to delay coercive action until ample time had been given for a friendly interchange of opinion between the Local Government Board and the county councils. But what did the Local Government Board do? They incontinently, in spite of the unanimous protest of all sections of the Irish Members, rushed to issue these sealed Orders all over Ireland.

Mr. Dillon.

*Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is simply continuing the debate which took place in Committee. An Order must be made under seal; and, if the Local Government Board exercise their discretion, they must do so by means of the legal machinery. As to the general policy of the Board in exercising their discretion, that is not a definite matter of urgent public importance. I quite understood that the hon. Member for West Kerry was going to show in the case of Wexford that some very important action had recently been taken by the Local Government Board; but the hon. Gentleman is making no distinction between this case and that already discussed in Committee.

*Sir THOMAS ESMONDE: As a matter of personal explanation, it was only on Saturday that I learned that the County Council of Wexford had been served with a sealed Order. I had no idea that any other county council had been served in the same way.

Mr. DILLON: I really think, Mr. Speaker, that you do not quite appreciate the line I was taking. My contention is that the Local Government Board, instead of exercising the discretion they have under the Act in a rational and wise way, have suddenly precipitated a collision between themselves and the County Council of Wexford which may lead to disturbance and agitation, and to a very serious strain upon the whole system of local government in Ireland.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): This motion is a very important concrete illustration of the general conduct of the Government in Ireland and of the Local Government Board. I would like to know whether the Local Government Board or the county council are the most competent to judge as to the sufficiency of an increase in salary to be given to the county surveyor. If there is a difference of opinion between the Local Government Board and the county council on a question of fact in regard to the remuneration of this surveyor, why could not the Local Government Board enter into argument and friendly negotiations with this particular county council, and settle the matter without this issue of a sealed Order? It may be necessary to issue a sealed Order, but why did the Local Government Board act so promptly? Surely the County Council of Wexford had given no indication that they were not inclined to treat any man unfairly. So far as I know, the County Council of Wexford had given every indication of their desire to treat their existing officers very fairly, and even in a liberal manner. This gentleman's duties had been increased in a very small degree, and an increase of £50 a year was quite enough. In a poor country like Ireland £650 a year is a salary of no mean dimensions. Whether the Local Government Board are right or wrong, they should be very chary indeed and slow to force their view in regard to the salaries of county officials in this arbitrary manner upon county councils, who ought to be the best judges as to whether the salaries are adequate or not, and whether the increase proposed is commensurate with the increased duties. The value of this particular motion of the hon. Baronet is that it is a concrete illustration of the dangerous practice now being pursued by the Local Government Board in setting aside the decision of the local authorities and coming down upon them in an autocratic manner with sealed Orders. It is trifling to say that sealed Orders mean nothing, and that they are absolutely necessary. That is not the point. The point is whether the Local Government Board ought to set aside the decision of the local authority on a local matter in an autocratic manner and say, "We say so and so, and there is no appeal from our decision."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): As I gather, the defence of the Government is that in issuing the sealed Order they were carrying out a mere Ministerial act. I quite appreciate that under the ruling of Mr. Speaker we cannot discuss the general policy of the Local Government Board in regard to these local officials. The narrow point to which we are confining ourselves is as to the issue of this sealed Order. I accept fully the description of a sealed Order given by the Chief Secretary and the Attorney General—that it is an Order with the proper and technical formality of the attachment of a seal. But the Attorney General says that a sealed Order in this particular case was necessary, because without it the county surveyor would not be entitled or enabled to take legal action against the county council. Does not that, after all, come to this: that the Local Government Board have taken upon themselves the responsibility—I will not say of encouraging, but of enabling the county surveyor to enter into litigation with the county council? If that is so, I put it to the Attorney General whether it was not entirely within the discretion of the Local Government Board to postpone or delay the issue of the sealed Order in question. Reason, prudence, and policy should have dictated them to adopt such a course. But they have shown—I will not say indecent, but considerable haste in issuing this sealed Order, and in that way have driven the county surveyor into litigation with the county council. I put it to the Government whether it is fair to the county councils that they should be forced into this conflict with the authorities, into which they are forced by the action of the Government. Is it in the interests of good government and order in Ireland generally that this contest should be forced and accelerated on the county surveyor? My hon. friend has put his case to the Government, who have met his suggestions with persistent refusals, and now the responsibility of safeguarding the authorities of law, self-government and order must rest upon the Government.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) felt it his duty to associate himself with the protest which had been raised by the hon. Member for East Mayo. Under the old grand jury system £60 a year was considered a proper and sufficient sum for the salary of the county surveyor, but when popular self-government was given to Ireland the Government thought that the sum should be raised to £150, and, therefore, a sealed Order was sent to the county councils to pay that salary. The only conclusion he could come to was that, the landlords having been relieved of all rates, the county council was now to be compelled to increase the rates for an improper purpose. He protested against the sealed Order being sent down, and thought that the county council ought not only to protest against it, but also to refuse to comply with it. He desired to know whether under the sealed Orders the county councils had a right to discharge the county surveyors with or without a gratuity or pension. Having regard to the efforts which were being made in favour of popular self-government, it was the duty of all Irish Members to protest against the action of the Government, and show the constituents that the increase in the rates was not due to the county councils, but to the action of the Local Government Board.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said the sealed Order which had been stated by the Attorney General for Ireland and the Chief Secretary to be a mere Ministerial act was, in fact, something more. It was a fiat which enabled the county surveyor of Wexford to take action against the Wexford County Council. In his opinion greater discretion ought to have been exercised, and the Local Government Board ought to have waited until the time came when no compromise between the county council and the county surveyor appeared to be possible. The Government ought to have had more discretion than to allow the Local Government Board to have acted as they had done, and to that extent the Government were responsible.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.) desired to join in the protest which had been made by the Irish Members against the way in which the Local Government Board had treated Wexford by the issue of the sealed Order. He was glad that the county council had taken the step they had with regard to it, for the reason that if matters like this were allowed to pass without protest, the inhabitants of Ireland would look not to the county councils, but to the Local Government Board, as the local authority. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would show the same regard to the various localities, and not seek to override their action as he had done with regard to this matter.

Question put.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clause 3:—

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I confess that when I read, with great interest and satisfaction, the report of the debate in another place on Friday last,* I hoped we should to-night have the welcome announcement of the withdrawal of this Bill. Any Government with the feelings of ordinary human beings in their breasts would have been determined to withdraw the Bill, by the act of the Irish landlords, in selecting this instant to inflict upon them a humiliating defeat.

*See page 728 of this volume.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot discuss that matter. I called upon him to move an Amendment.

MR. DILLON: I will come to the Amendment, and I hope to find the Government in a more reasonable frame of mind than was the case last week. I trust they will consent to accept the Amendment I am about to move, for it appears to me to be an Amendment so manifestly reasonable, and so just on the face of it, that I do not understand how any argument can be used against it. The Government have decided not only to break up the settlement of 1872 and to make tithe rent-charges in Ireland once more variable, without offering to the Committee a single reason for making that great change, but they have decided to make them variable on a totally new principle. That principle is that they shall vary in accordance no longer with the prices of agricultural produce, but with judicial rents. Is it unreasonable that I should ask, when they have decided so radically to alter the standard of variation, that that variation should be confined for the future to cases of tithe rent-charge which issue out of hereditaments in respect of which judicial rents have been fixed? I think it is hardly possible to imagine a more reasonable or logical Amendment than that. I can fortify my case in support of this Amendment by referring to that portion of the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary attempted to make a case of grievance in justification of this reduction of tithe rent-charge. There can be no doubt that the only attempt he made to justify this proposal was on the ground that the landlords' rents had been reduced. If that be the cause of this alteration—and we have listened in vain throughout these debates for any other alleged ground of justification—is it not manifest that the benefit of the change should be confined to cases in which the rents have been reduced? We who have followed the operation of the Irish Land Courts are aware that the application of the judicial rent sections of the Land Acts is confined strictly to certain classes of farms, and that there are large areas of land, including a great deal of the richest land in the country, which do not come under those sections at all. Are we to be told that a man who is deriving a large income from, say, grass farms, future tenancies, and so forth, or any of the various classes of farm which are specifically excluded from the judicial rent clauses of the Land Acts, is to obtain a reduction in his tithe rent-charge in proportion to the reduction of judicial rents on other holdings in which he has no financial interest, simply because of the grievance caused to his class by the reduction of judicial rents? That is a perfectly grotesque absurdity in the present Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman had proposed to break up the settlement of 1872 simply and solely by restoring the law as it then stood, something could be said for not going into the figures, and refusing to investigate the operation of the proposal. But the right hon. Gentleman is not proposing to recur to the condition of the law prior to 1872; he is deliberately proposing to apply to this tithe rent-charge a new standard of variation which will be infinitely more favourable to the landlords than the old standard. The case for this Amendment is greatly strengthened by the fact that, according to the landlords themselves, this new standard will do much more for them than the old system would do. I feel bound to say a few words on this point, because the right hon. Gentleman, in various speeches, has asserted that if the old system under which tithe rent-charge was variable were reverted to, the reduction would be greater than under the scheme now proposed. Let us hear what the landlords themselves have to say. Commenting on the remarks of the Chief Secretary in regard to certain Amendments proposed on Wednesday last, the Daily Express, the chief organ of the landlords, used this language—

"The enacting part of this arrangement is in Clause 3, Clause 2 merely directing preliminary steps. It was, however, opposed by the Nationalists, who desired that the industry of that noble body, the Land Commission, should be devoted to ascertaining something quite different, that is, the variation in prices of agricultural produce during that period. We say advisedly 'something quite different,' for it is notorious that the reduction in rent has been out of all proportion to the fall in agricultural values. The Nationalists have reason to know this better than anybody, as the difference has gone into their own pockets. Consequently they are in favour of setting up a standard which would justify reductions much less than that foreshadowed by Mr. Balfour's Bill."

Whether or not that is a correct view, it is the view of the landlords. It appears to me that this is an exceptional case, and therefore I trust the Government will without wasting time accept this Amendment, and let us proceed to other and more contentious matters. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 28, after the word 'hereditaments,' to insert the words 'in respect of which judicial rents have been fixed."—Mr. Dillon.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central) contended that the Amendment was wrong in principle and would be unfair in practice. It was wrong in principle because it assumed what he had again and again denied—that the Government were proposing to make tithe rent-charge variable because rents had been reduced. The alteration in rents was taken merely as a measure. The Government did not say that tithes should be reduced because rents had been reduced, but they said that tithes should be made variable, and variable by a measure or standard better than that which had hitherto been in use. The Committee had decided that the standard to be adopted should be that proposed in the Bill, and now the hon. Member came forward and asked that that standard should be applied only in cases where rents had actually been fixed by the Land Commission. Why should the application of the standard be restricted to those cases? It was impossible to give any reason for such a restriction when once it was clearly appreciated that the alteration in rents was taken merely as a standard and a measure. The Amendment would also be grossly unfair in practice, because it would exempt from the operation of the clause lands which had every bit as much right to the benefit as those to which the clause would then apply.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): The right hon. Gentleman has again repeated the denial he has made on previous occasions, that the reduction of rents by the judicial process is the reason for this Bill. He says the reduction of rents is the measure of the relief proposed, but not the reason for proposing that relief. He asserts that as a member of the Government, having a knowledge superior to that possessed by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway. I accept his declaration with some difficulty, because I cannot reconcile it with the equally emphatic declaration made by members of the Cabinet in another place two or three days ago. In answer to a motion which expressly declared the grievances suffered by Irish landlords through legislation since 1881, and demanding relief for those grievances, the Duke of Devonshire stated that relief had already been provided, first, in the Purchase Acts; secondly, in the remission of rates to the extent of £316,000 a year; and then he went on to say in the same connection that—

"The measure now before the House of Commons will give landlords further relief of the same character."

Later on he said that—

"The Tithe Rent-Charge Bill now before the House of Commons shows a sympathetic spirit for a class and an interest which we believe to be in an unfortunate and difficult position"— the unfortunate and difficult position being that which is created by legislation since 1881, which I suppose may be summed up in the reduction of rents by the judicial courts. How, in the face of that declaration, can it be maintained that the judicial reduction of rents is not the reason for, but only the measure of, this relief? I think as between those two statements, which are absolutely irreconcilable, I must accept that made by the superior authority, and therefore we are entitled —nay, we are bound—to regard the reduction of judicial rents as the reason as well as the measure. And what are the contradictions in which we are involved thereby? The right hon. Gentleman said, as if it was an argument on his own side, that all the land in Ireland is not subject to rents. I do not know much of the Irish land question, but I believe this is a fact—that the land of Ireland can be divided into three categories. There are the hereditaments not under rents, but which pay tithes; there are the hereditaments which are not under judicial rents which pay tithes; and there are those under judicial rents. How in the name of goodness can it be a reason for giving relief to the first two classes that the third are subject to a judicial process? Or how can you get a rational measure thereby? What reason can be assigned why this particular mode of reduction should be more rational than any other? When the variation depended on prices, you had a variable element which affected practically all the land of Ireland, but now you are selecting as your measure of variation an element which has no relation to two out of the three classes into which Irish land is divided. Therefore, whether regarded as a measure or as a reason, the proposal of the Government is one which cannot really be defended, and I shall be constrained to vote for the Amendment. I would warn the House against the introduction of these artificial measures. We had exactly the same question of artificiality in the Merchant Shipping Bill, and it is essential for those of us who want reasonable legislation in a matter of this sort to vote for the Amendment of my hon. friend.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) looked upon the Amendment as fair and equitable. The new standard of variation should be confined exclusively to tenancies which had been affected by the conditions to which the new standard of variation was applicable. It was perfectly ridiculous to say that the tithe rent-charge of tenancies which had not been subjected to judicial rents should be subject to a measure of reduction which was the creation of the Land Acts from which those tenancies had been absolutely exempt. It might be, and it was, alleged that this new variation would work out some compensation to those whose property had been affected by the reduction of rents. Be it so; but how could the standard apply to those whose property had been as unaffected by any legislation of Mr. Gladstone's as they were before 1870? There was no use disguising the word. The Bill was an outrageous fraud. Under the Irish Church Act it was provided that the surplus of the Irish Church Fund should be applicable to charitable purposes or the relief of those who suffered distress. If they applied the reduction of tithes to land unaffected by the legislation of the last thirty years they were perpetrating a palpable fraud. What was the object of this Bill, and what was the reason for its introduction? If it was not for the relief of the landlords, why did they include in this system for the reduction of tithes the owners of land who, under no possibility whatever, had been affected by recent land legislation? If ever there was a fair and equitable Amendment it was that proposed by his hon. friend. Unfortunately, this Bill was to lay Members a Chinese puzzle, and it was very difficult to distinguish between the legal and technical terms with which it was draped. Could the right hon. Gentleman give any reason which would appeal to any fair-minded man why land which had never come under the operation of the Church Acts or of the Acts of 1870 and 1881 should be included in this clause? By including these lands which had not been subject to this law before, Parliament violated two distinct Acts of Parliament—the Church Act of 1869 and the Amending Act of 1872. There was not a shadow of a pretext for this proposal, which was purely the exercising of a dominant power. He believed in his heart and conscience that if the hon. Gentlemen opposite had taken the trouble to master this Bill, they would never have supported it.

Mr. Swift MacNeill.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said that this Amendment proceeded actually on the lines of the clause itself, and on the lines upon which the Bill was originally framed and introduced. The Amendment really meant that if there were to be reductions or variations they should only be in respect of holdings of which the judicial rents had been fixed. Surely that was the line upon which the Bill was constructed and upon which the clause proceeded. He thought this was an Amendment which ought to be accepted. He did not think the Chief Secretary would hold that where a judicial rent had not been fixed there should be a variation and a reduction of tithe rent. The clause proposed that whether the judicial rent had been fixed or not, or whether there had been a reduction of rent or not, there should be a reduction of tithe-rent charge. It was perfectly hopeless for the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to argue that this variation in tithe-rent charges did not aim at compensating landlords who had had their rents reduced by the Court. That case had been given away completely by the speech of the Duke of Devonshire in another place. He thought they were bound to take the noble Lord's declaration as the view of the Government. This Bill had been brought in to give relief to the landlords in cases where the rents had been reduced by judicial process. He wished to ask if they were now prepared to provide that the tithe rent-charges should be reduced to landlords in respect of holdings of which the judicial rents had not been fixed? Was the tithe rent-charge to be reduced on behalf of landlords where the rents had not been reduced at all? He understood that, roughly speaking, the judicial rents fixed in Ireland were very much less than 50 per cent of the whole. What became of the other 50 per cent.? There must be a large number of cases where the landlord and tenant came to an agreement, and where the tenant considered that he was not justified in seeking the protection of the Court. But even in those cases where the landlord had lost nothing and where the rent had not been reduced, he was to get the benefit of this clause just the same as those whose rents had been reduced, and also to the same extent. The class of tenants who at the passing of this Act were in arrears—which had been held in terrorem over them—had never been able to get judicial rents fixed, and those arrears were held over them to prevent their seeking the benefit of the legislation. If the Committee did not accept this Amendment, the landlords to whom he had just referred would get the benefit of this clause just the same as those landlords where judicial rents had been fixed by the process of legislation. There was another large class at the present moment upon whom the landlord had reimposed the whole rent under Section 7 of the Act of 1887. They were still paying the old unreduced rents, and in tens of thousands of these cases the landlord would be entitled to the full amount of reduction on the tithe rent-charge. And why? Were they justly entitled to it? Nobody ever heard of such a hard-and-fast line. If they were bound to have some fixed rule, at any rate they should try and make it approach as near to justice as was possible, but nobody would argue that the reduction embodied and enshrined in this clause was either fair or equitable. They knew now that during the same period rents in Somersetshire had been reduced 35 per cent., whilst in Ireland the average was only about 15 per cent., and under those circumstances they were now proposing to give further relief to the landlords of Ireland. It was not sufficient for the representatives of the Government to make a few perfunctory remarks on the Bill, and then join in a conspiracy of silence, when they could not meet the arguments brought against their proposals. It would be more satisfactory if the Chief Secretary for Ireland declared that, no matter what case was made out, or whatever powerful arguments were brought forward, the Government did not intend to accept any Amendments; and the right hon. Gentleman might as well say bluntly, "Whether right or wrong, we shall accept no Amendments whatever to this clause."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said he quite agreed with his hon. friend who had just sat down that it would be a saving of time, and a much more regular and forward policy on the part of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he would abstain from offering any arguments or making any speeches in reply to the Amendments proposed, because it seemed quite clear that the right hon. Gentleman traversed not only the statement made by others who are members of the same Government in a higher and more responsible position than himself, but he even traversed his own statements. He was not surprised that the Chief Secretary should deny that this Bill was founded upon a reduction of rents. The right hon. Gentleman vehemently denied that, because he knew that if he came down to the Committee and said this Bill was based upon a reduction of rents he would be confronted with two difficulties. He would be confronted with the delaration of a Cabinet Minister in another place, and there would be the greater difficulty that if he came down to this House and defended this Bill on the ground of reduction of rents his case would be absolutely extirpated by the speech to which he had just alluded. How could the right hon. Gentleman put the case of exceptional hardship forward as a plea in favour of this Bill, in face of the fact that one of the greatest of Irish landlords and a Cabinet Minister had asserted that the landlords of Ireland were in an exceptionally favourable position as compared with the landlords of England? He was glad that this debate had at least elicited a great truth which they had been endeavouring for the last fifteen or twenty years to impress upon this country—namely, that in spite of agitation, and in spite of the legislation of the past twenty years in this House, they had not even succeeded in getting the rents in Ireland reduced in the same proportion as they had been reduced in England. In face of the confession made in another place by a Cabinet Minister that rents in England had been doubly reduced as compared with Ireland, he was not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman disclaimed altogether that the principle of this Bill was governed by the reduction of rents in Ireland. Upon this question the right hon. Gentleman was forgetful even of his own words. The Chief Secretary was almost driven to anger when the hon. Member for Dundee suggested that the reduction of rents had something to do with this Bill; but when his hon. and learned friend made that assertion he was only repeating what the right hon. Gentleman himself had said in a previous debate upon this Bill. That was his recollection of the debate, but since then he had consulted the records, and he found the report absolutely in accord with his own recollection. In that speech the right hon. Gentleman said that he did not think the tithe rent-charge should be reduced because rents had been reduced, but he said the hardship of the situation was emphasised by the fact that rents had been compulsorily reduced. So that the right hon. Gentleman brought in the reduction of rent not as a sole reason for the reduction of tithes, although he said that the compulsory reduction emphasised the hardship. He admitted that the reduction of rents was at least a contributing cause, and it was considered a very potent reason for the reduction of tithes. Therefore his hon. and learned friend, when he declared that the reduction of rents was brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman as a reason for introducing this Bill, was strictly in accord with the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman himself. Therefore they arrived at this position: that this Bill had been brought forward, according to the right hon. Gentleman, partly because a grievance had been created in Ireland in regard to the tithes, by the compulsory reduction of rents. They were now face to face with the fact that the more the rents were reduced the greater relief would the landlords get under this Bill. Relief was now to be given with an equally liberal and bounteous hand to the landlords whose rents had been reduced judicially, and also to those whose rents had been reduced voluntarily. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the rents had been compulsorily reduced. Yes, they had been reduced compulsorily in Ireland by about 16 per cent.; but during the same period the rents had been voluntarily reduced in England by 35 per cent. If the reduction of rent by judicial process was a hardship and entitled the landlords to a reduction of their tithes, all they asked for was that those landlords should be left out who had not reduced their rents. Those landlords had no complaint to make. Their rents had not been reduced at all, or if they had been reduced it was by voluntary process. His hon. friend proposed, by his Amendment, that, as the whole foundation of the Bill was practically based upon the compulsory reduction of rents by judicial process, those estates should not get relief where there had been no compulsory reduction. He put it to the hon. Members opposite, who understood the affairs of Ireland very well, whether they ought not to consider seriously how wide and far-reaching the effect of this proposal would be. There seemed to be a popular idea in the House that every single farm in Ireland had been brought before the Land Court, and that in every case the rent had been reduced. That was an entirely erroneous impression. He had not had the time to run through the figures exhaustively in the short time at his disposal, but he thought the Attorney General would confirm the figures which he would give, and which he had taken from the last Report of the Land Commission. He believed there were about 500,000 holdings in Ireland altogether; and what had happened in regard to them? Of this total 144,689 had been brought before the Land Commission and had had their rents reduced. In addition there had been 32,040 brought before other courts, and altogether 176,729 cases had been dealt with. To put it roughly, about 200,000 cases had been the subject of judicial process. What did that mean? If this Amendment was accepted the reduction of tithes would apply only in the case of these 200,000 holdings. In other words, the statistics showed that not one-half of the entire number of holdings in Ireland had been made the subject of legal process; and what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do under this Bill was to give relief not to the 200,000 judicially-rented holdings, but also to the 300,000 which had never gone through any judicial process at all. He thought his hon. friend had made out a good case for this Amendment.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I think it is the bounden duty of every Irish Member to endeavour to inform the Committee as to the nature of this Amendment. It appears to me if the clause remains unamended that there cannot be a more arbitrary or illogical standard than that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman for reducing the tithe rent-charge. I will not repeat what has been so forcibly stated by my hon. friend who has just spoken, but I wish to emphasise the fact that in every county in Ireland there are three classes of tenants—namely, present tenants, whose rents have been subject to the orders of the Land Commission; future tenants, who are not within the purview of the Acts at all; and a great number of tenants whose rents are moderate, who have reasonable landlords, and who are satisfied to pay on the old system. Why should you select one, and that the smallest class, as the standard by which all the tithes are to be reduced? There cannot be a more illogical or indefensible proposal. Tithes in England are revisable by a certain standard based on the price of corn.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is now entering upon a discussion which has already been disposed of.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I will not pursue the point further. I was only about to remind the Committee what the existing standard in England is, because I am always glad, whenever I can, to adopt the procedure which obtains in this great country of England, with its great prosperity and its great wealth. Has any reason been assigned for this arbitrary standard? I could understand the argument, if the fact was so, although I would protest against it, that as all the rents in Ireland had been reduced by the action of the Land Commission, that universal reduction would be adopted as the standard for reducing the tithe rent-charge. There would be some substance in that argument, but it is wholly inconsistent and illogical to select this standard, especially when we recollect that, in the wisdom of Parliament, it was decided years ago that, as far as ecclesiastical tithe-rent was concerned, it should not be revisable at all.

MR. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.) said, to his own knowledge, there were many tenants in Ireland who had not their rents reduced at all, because they had been kept out of the courts by the ingenuity of clever agents, who always allowed arrears to hang over them, and by that simple means prevented them from taking advantage of the Act. Would the landlords of these tenants have the same reduction as the landlords on whose estates fair rents had been fixed? He merely mentioned that to show the unfairness of the manner in which the spoil was to be distributed. There was another class of tenants in Ireland who were fairly satisfied with their rents, and who had certain turbary rights which they would lose if they went into the courts, and they preferred to keep those rights rather than lose them by having their rents reduced. He should like to know what the state of Ireland would have been had not Parliament compelled the Irish landlords to reduce the rents. A few weeks ago a very important English landlord told him that he had reduced his rents 75 per cent., which he said was the general reduction throughout England. Assuming that the Irish landlords had been as sympathetic with their tenants and as anxious to see their tenants thrive as English landlords were, the law would never have stepped in to compel them to reduce their rents. Morever, the English landlords made all the improvements, whereas the Irish landlords not only made no improvements, but charged an exorbitant rent to the tenant for the improvements he himself had made.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member seems to me to be discussing the general land question.

MR. DOOGAN said he would put himself in order. He wanted to show that the element of the compulsory reduction of rent which was necessary in order to make landlords do their duty in Ireland should not be adopted as an argument for the reduction of tithe. The basis of the distribution of the money was unfair, because many landlords on whose estates no reductions had been made would benefit equally with landlords on whose estates the rents had been reduced. Under the Bill the landlords would get an enormous reduction, but if the Amendment were accepted they would still get a substantial reduction, though not to the extent now proposed. The limits of the question were very narrow. The proposed basis for the division of the money was erroneous, and would work unequally. He supported the Amendment because of the injustice that would be perpetrated if the Bill remained as it was.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Mr. Anstruther.

MR. DILLON: I do not propose to move my next Amendment on the Paper, as it refers back to a point in Clause 2 which has already been decided. I, however, propose to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, which is—

"In Clause 3, page 2, line 35, after 'accordingly,' to insert, 'provided that any such tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission shall not be deemed to be so varied to a greater amount than that in which the rents payable to the person by whom such tithe rent-charge is payable in respect of the hereditaments out of which the same is payable have been varied by the fixing of judicial rents as aforesaid."

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think that Amendment is out of order. It raises points which the Committee have already decided. For instance, in regard to the Land Commission the Committee have already decided to draw no distinction between tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission and that payable to the lay impropriators; and the Committee have just decided to draw no distinction between those who have to pay tithe rent-charge who are in receipt of judicial rents and those who are not.

MR. DILLON: I have studied this matter very carefully, and I confess, with all submission, that I do not accept the interpretation which you, Mr. Lowther, put on the effect of the Amendment on other clauses. In the first place, this proposal is not to make the tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission invariable, as the previous Amendment did, but it is a proviso that there should be some distinction between the tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission and that payable to lay impropriators. The previous Amendment would have cut the tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission completely out of the clause. The question raised by the latter portion of the Amendment is totally different, though somewhat analogous — namely, that the advantage given to individuals participating in these results should be proportioned to their receipt of judicial rents. I will put a case which I know personally. A man is the owner of an estate of which one half is left tenantless, and in respect of which he loses a portion of his income. The other half is let to another man. Now, the judicial rents of the whole estate are affected, but the man who is compelled to pay tithe rent-charge on the whole estate loses his income in respect of half. The point of this Amendment is that he should only get the benefit of the reduction in respect of half the rent-charge.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I followed the argument of the hon. Gentleman, and I think I also understand his Amendment. It seems to me that the Committee decided on Thursday last that no distinction will be made between tithe rent-charge payable to the Land Commission and tithe rent-charge payable to lay impropriators. As to the second part of the Amendment, the Committee have just decided that no distinction will be made between those persons whose rents have been judicially fixed and those whose rents have not been judicially fixed. The Amendment raises the same two questions again. For these reasons I ask the hon. Member to move the next Amendment.

MR. DILLON: I beg to move to leave out Sub-section 2 of Clause 3. This sub-section provides for the carrying forward the variation according to judicial rents to each succeeding period of fifteen years, and thereby emphasises the evil consequences of this proposed Act. I am not at all surprised that the Chief Secretary said he utterly denied that this provision for reducing tithe rent-charge according to judicial rents was based upon the fall in rents—although I was amazed at his courage in saying so—because if he had adhered to the position he took up in introducing the Bill, it would have been absolutely impossible for him to have resisted the last Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Bill last year, said—

> "It must be remembered that the charge is a charge upon rents, and while rents have been greatly reduced under the supervision of a state tribunal the rent-charge can no longer be varied. While I am not prepared to place this grievance in the same category with the first-mentioned, I do think a hardship has been inflicted on the tithe-payer to which it would be desirable to apply a remedy, if a reasonable remedy can be found."*

I maintain that there is no meaning in that sentence at all if it does not mean that the grievance of the landlords was the reduction of rents in Ireland. Twenty-eight years ago the landlords of Ireland agreed to make the tithe rent-charge invariable, and no reason has been given for a change in that settlement, except that the landlords have a grievance. But we are entitled to demand some explanation and definition of the nature of the grievance. According to the statement in the Dublin Daily Express, the landlords themselves admit that the standard, of which this sub-section of Clause 3 is a most vicious continuance, is one giving to them a far greater reduction than they would have got under the old law. Admitting for the sake of argument that the landlords had a grievance—which I most certainly deny—no reason has been brought forward on behalf of the Government to show that the injustice should be remedied, not according to the old law, but according to a new and unheard of standard which will give the landlords a vastly greater reduction than under the old law. I assert, without fear of contradiction, that from the first introduction of the Bill down to this hour, no attempt has been made to justify that change. This sub-section asks us to accept this vicious principle, and carry it on to successive periods of fifteen years, and the Government afford us no information as to what the reductions may amount to in the future, whether twenty, thirty, or fifty per cent. I move to omit the sub-section because I believe it to be an illimitable application of an extremely unjust and vicious principle, and because it is a leap in the dark, the effect of which is absolutely uncertain.

"In page 2, line 36, to leave out Sub-section 2."—(Mr. Dillon.)

MR. FLYNN, in supporting the Amendment, maintained that the House was entitled to know what was to become of the Church Fund thirty or forty years hence. Where did the matter stand if, after the expiry of fifteen years, when this provision was put into force, it was found that there was a further and dangerous incursion into the coffers of the Church Fund? The grants to the Agricultural Board and the Congested Districts Board and other grants were all thrown upon the Irish Church Fund, and yet the Government, not content with throwing all those charges upon it, were going a step further. How would the matter stand if at the end of thirty years the fund was put into such a condition that it could not meet its engagements? Would it not be better to allow the clause to run for fifteen years only? Then, if it was necessary, a further Bill could be introduced for another fifteen years. Under Sub-section 2 as it at present stood steps were being taken which would seriously imperil the Irish Church Fund; that was a very serious matter. This sub-section set up a very dangerous principle. With regard to the Land Act they knew to an extent where they were; that the average reductions which had been made since 1881 could be pretty well ascertained; but when Sub-section 2 came to be considered they were dealing with a hypothetical set of figures. Let the Committee assume for a moment that, owing to the increased importation of foreign produce, prices continued to decline; the reductions for the second period of fifteen years would be much greater than the reductions during the first period, and that would make a still further incursion into the Church Fund, which might render it unable to perform its obligations. It might be said that these results could not occur, but in all probability they would occur. If they did, was the reduction of the judicial rents to go on with the reduction of tithes, and, if so, why? So far as the Government was concerned, no argument urged against the sub-section made the slightest impression, and it was a significant commentary upon this piece of legislation that upon the only Irish Bill of the session there was not a single member representing the Treasury present to safeguard the Irish Church Fund. Irish Members had long ceased to look to the Chief Secretary to safeguard any Irish fund, but they had hoped, if this step was to be taken with regard to the first fifteen years after the passing of the Act, it would have been limited to that, and the Government might then be left to deal with the condition of things which might then arise. Even at the eleventh hour he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider the position with regard to Sub-clause 2, and make some slight concession in a clause which bristled with difficulties.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL joined in the appeal to the right. hon. Gentleman to leave out the sub-clause. It was a most reasonable suggestion that the experiment should not be made perpetual, and by leaving out the sub-clause it would always be open to the Legislature to say whether this legislation should at the end of fifteen years be renewed or not. He desired to call the attention of the Committee to the fact that this particular clause applied to both ecclesiastical and lay tithes. They already knew that during the last fifteen years in many parts of Ireland rents had been greatly reduced—33⅓ per cent. in some instances; and the effect of this sub-clause would be to whittle away the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge to a very great extent. The Government did not appear to apprehend the fact that this was a leap in the dark; the Church Fund itself was nothing more than the accumulation of the revenue of the tithe rent-charge, which amounted to some £200,000 a year. It was the only fund existing to pay the costs of all the charitable Acts of Parliament passed for the benefit of Ireland, which, if that fund was whittled down, would all fall upon the Exchequer. Under those circumstances, why perpetuate a state of things until it was found whether it was right or wrong? With regard to the lay tithes, he had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, in order to prepare for this discussion, asking for information as to the amount of the lay tithes. The attitude which the right hon. Gentleman took up was that the Government had no means of ascertaining the amount of the lay tithes, which was quite possible and reasonable, seeing that the lay tithes were private property. But the revenue from the lay tithes I have heard stated to amount to £140,000 or £150,000 a year, and that was private property and dealt with as such, yet a perpetual clause was introduced into the Bill which might whittle that down to nothing if prices continued to fall and depression continued to exist for the next fifteen years, because that would necessitate further reductions. The Committee really did not realise how far-reaching the evil might be, and he hoped under the circumstances the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say that he had been attacked for not having given the reasons for this clause. He had given his reasons more than once, but he invariably found that, when he had sat down, hon. Gentlemen jumped up and asked for them again. He would, therefore, confine himself entirely to the question of whether the variations which the Committee had decided should take place during fifteen years should be continued for a further period. The only argument urged against that was the effect which this provision would have on the Church Fund. But in the Memorandum made in the previous year allowance was made for a further increase in the average reduction of rents in Ireland to the extent of from 20 to 30 per cent. He did not himself look forward to an indefinite series of reductions in the rents of Irish land. Those reductions, of course, must depend principally upon the fall of prices, but he did not think that they might look forward seriously for a very long time to come to reductions taking place that would impoverish the Church Fund to anything like the extent which the hon. and learned Member anticipated. Taking all reductions into account, the Church Fund would suffice to meet all the burdens upon it up to 1947, and even after that would be able to afford a large sum annually to the Department of Agriculture. Under those circumstances he thought he might fairly say that no serious danger need be apprehended to any of the purposes for which the Church Fund was security for the next generation, and if after thirty years the Church Fund should prove unequal to the burden of £70,000 for the Agricultural Department, that would be subject to such revision as the Treasury might deem necessary. But, for a generation at least, certainly the Church Fund would meet all its liabilities. If such an improbable contingency should arise that the fund could not bear the £70,000 for the Agricultural Department, it would be for Parliament to consider how the deficiency should be met.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.) said that his objection to the clause was that by it a perpetual arrangement was made by which the landlords were really made the possessors and manipulators of the Irish Church Fund. He thought the operation of the sub-section should be restricted to the next fifteen years. If that were done it might be considered a reasonable modification of the clause. That the landlords were to be the possessors of the Church Fund in perpetuity was not reasonable, and he hoped therefore that the right hon. Gentleman would limit the operation of the clause to fifteen years.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had put the case fairly and succinctly. This Bill, like a great many other measures passed for Ireland by English legislators, cursed him that gave and him that received. He had heard that it would not benefit the Irish landlords to any great extent. Only about £40,000 would go into their pockets. That amount distributed amongst a great many landlords would only result in a very small sum for each—so small that it reminded one of the story of the man who, during the revolution of 1848, went to Lord Rothschild and said all men are brothers, and demanded his share of wealth. Lord Rothschild gave him 10 centimes, and said that if he gave all his brothers a like amount it was more than they ought.

to receive. The result to the individual would be small. At the same time, £40,000 would be a serious peril to the fund. The Agricultural Board had £70,000 which they devoted to agriculture. It was a large sum, but the good which they were able to do with it in benefiting the various districts was very large indeed. In this Bill the right hon. Gentleman ran the risk of interfering with the good work done by this Board, simply in order to put an infinitesimal contribution into the pockets of the Irish landlords. That alone was a sufficient condemnation of the clause. He did not understand how the right hon. Gentleman could be precluded from accepting the Amendment of his hon. friend. It would not interfere with the working of the Bill, and by adopting the Amendment no new precedent would be created, because in the Irish Agricultural Rating Bill, passed a few sessions previously, a similar limitation was imposed. After a Parliamentary inquiry, the Government consented to limit the operation of that Act to five years. He hoped, therefore, in the present case the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to comply with the reasonable request of the Irish Members to limit this measure not for five years or even ten, but for fifteen years, which could not be considered not to be a reasonable time to give for the experiment. This clause meant that the landlords would hold a perpetual mortgage over the Church Fund. In Ulster he found that the reduction in the second statutory term—that was to say, the reduction not on the original rents, but the reduced rents—was in Antrim 25 per cent. and Fermanagh 24 per cent. The average reduction in the province of Ulster was 25 per cent., in the province of Leinster 24·3, in the province of Connaught 23·8, and in the province of Munster 21·3. He might interject the observation that the more he went into the question of rent reduction in Ireland the more convinced was he that the farmers who had suffered most from exorbitant and unconscionable rack-renting were those of the loyal Unionist province of Ulster, for whom the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh and other such gentlemen were the advocates in that House. It was now near the dinner hour, and he hoped his congratulations might aid the appetite of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. He congratulated the Member for North Armagh on the extraordinary political adroitness by which the landlords of Ulster had been able to convince the loyal but violently rack-rented farmers of that province that they were doing so exceedingly well by their English connection. The reduction of 25 per cent. in the second statutory term, added to the reduction in the first statutory term in Ulster, made altogether something like 45 to 50 per cent. If that was to go on what was to become of the Irish Church Fund? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had come to the extraordinary conclusion that the reduction of rents in Ireland had come to an end. How did he know?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR remarked that reductions could not go on for ever.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be in office in another House of Commons—which was at least possible—and that he would bring in a measure which would abolish rent altogether in the greater part of Ireland by a judicious and fair system of compulsory land purchase. That was, perhaps, what the right hon. Gentleman had in his mind, and to that extent he agreed with him that these reductions could not go on for ever. At the same time they saw no sign of that step now. The causes which had produced the present reduction of rent were still going on. What he might almost call the wickedness of this Bill practically was that it might, by the redemption of tithes, reduce to the vanishing point that magnificent fund which was doing such wonderful work in Ireland. While this clause perpetuated what they regarded as an injury, it would not have the effect the right hon. Gentleman anticipated. If the right hon. Gentleman had any hallucination that this clause, or any other clause, would have the effect of stopping the mouths and the demands of the landlords of Ireland, he must have come to that conclusion within the last six or seven days. At the very moment when he was pushing this Bill through the House, the landlords of Ireland defeated his colleagues in another place. In pushing this Bill the right hon. Gentleman was using precious Parliamentary time—time which the Leader of the House found so valuable that he was not able to give it to any measure called contentious in any sense of the word—time so valuable that the children of the country could not be relieved from the tyranny of wicked and unprincipled parents who sent them to the public-house. At the very moment when the right hon. Gentleman was wasting Parliamentary time by pushing this Bill through the House, his friends and protégés were bringing in their claim for another piece of impossible relief in another House. This Bill would have the effect of doing great injustice to the tenantry of Ireland. it would seriously impede the best and the only good Department in Ireland, and at the same time it would bring no peace or satisfaction to the class it was intended to benefit.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR was understood to say that the conclusion the hon. Member had come to in regard to the effect of the redemption of tithes on the Church Fund was not in accordance with his own expectation.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.) complained that the provisions of the Bill were so complicated, and the information supplied so meagre, that it was difficult to form any true idea of the effects of the measure.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, Cork County, Mid). House counted, and, forty Members being found present,

MR. POWER contended that it would be very much fairer if, instead of making this charge a charge in perpetuity, the standard was tried for the first fifteen years, and then it could be re-considered. The fund upon which the charge was to be made was established for purposes of general public utility, and no one could contend that the object to which the money was to be applied in this case was one of "general public utility." There were certain crying demands, such as education and migration, which would come within that category, but certainly the relief of the worst class of rack-renting landlords would not. He altogether failed to see why these tithe-payers should have any such terms offered to them, as they were perfectly well satisfied with the terms they received when the Church was disestablished. The Chief Secretary had made the admission that it was quite possible there would be larger calls upon the fund than were anticipated, in which case the grant to the Agricultural Department would be jeopardised to some extent, but that then Ireland would have a very good claim to come to the House and ask for a grant out of Imperial funds. That was an admission they were glad to have, but how did they know who would be on the Treasury bench when that time came? This proposal would not satisfy the landlords, but at the same time it would dissipate a fund which, by judicious management, might do great good to the country generally.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR desired to make a last appeal to the Chief Secretary to limit the operation of the clause to the next fifteen years. The right hon. Gentleman had with an iron inflexibility stuck to every word of the Bill, and had conceded nothing whatever to the representatives from Ireland. He admired the right hon. Gentleman's firmness when he had a good case, but this was an iniquitous Bill, and in such a case firmness was not a virtue, but a vice. If the experiment was limited to the fifteen years, the matter could then be again considered, and any further necessary changes might be made. Surely the Chief Secretary could concede that much to the universal demand of Members from Ireland.

MR. FLYNN declared that the Treasury Memorandum of 1899 could not be accepted, because four years previously a Treasury Minute declared that the Irish Church Fund could not bear any further charges without serious danger of insolvency. Moreover, the belated document of 1899 could not be taken as authentic, as it was evidently a "cooked" Memorandum prepared for an obvious and specific purpose.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Captain Donelan and Mr.
Patrick O'Brien.

MR. DILLON said he did not intend to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth, although he believed he would be in order in doing so. The Amendment he wished to propose was to provide "that the owners of lay impropriate tithe rent-charge may elect to have the tithe payable to them varied according to the provisions of the present law." He protested against mixing up two utterly different subjects. Observe what this Bill proposed to do with lay impropriate tithes. Those tithes were private property, and had been private property since the Reformation. They were just as much private property as railway or any other stock. In dealing with lay impropriate tithes there was no question of a grievance in the same sense as had been contended in the case of the landlords. Lay impropriate tithes had been dealt with as private property, and had been bought and sold for many generations without any variation. He did not know any class of property which had been more frequently sold, and these tithes were very frequently made the subject of investments under marriage settlements. These tithes had always been valued in accordance with a certain standard. In some parts of the country they were variable in proportion to the price of oats, and in other parts in proportion to the price of wheat. But whether they were variable according to the price of wheat or oats, those who had bought and sold them had done so upon the basis of the price of the article with which they were varied. The necessity for legislation in the case of lay impropriate tithes appears to arise from a totally different cause than the necessity for legislation in the case of ecclesiastical tithe-payers. In this case the only necessity is the neglect of the Government in Dublin to publish the average prices of oats and wheat in the Dublin Gazette. But whatever difference arose in the case of lay impropriator tithe-payers would be removed by a single clause making the variations depend on the prices published in the Annual Reports of the Land Commissioners. That would remove the difficulty, and restore the owners and the payers of these tithes to their strict and well ascertained and legal rights which had prevailed since 1838. The Government in this Bill proposed to deal with private property in a way in which it was never proposed to be dealt with before. Without a shadow of reason or ground, the Government proposed to deal with this private property by introducing a new standard of variation never heard of before, which would, in many instances, reduce this private property by a greater percentage than it was legally rateable under the present law. Let them consider the case of the person of moderate income, who held £50 invested in lay impropriate tithes. Suppose that was in a district where oats was the measure of the value, and where they were entitled to get tithes revised on the basis of the price of oats. If he got them revised on that basis under the present law he might obtain 10, 12, or 15 per cent. reduction. But because the authorities at Dublin Castle neglected to publish in the Dublin Gazette the average price of oats and wheat, which was necessary for this man to get his tithes revised, the Government now came forward and proposed a Bill under which the tithe would be revised on a new scale, which would cut away from the owner of this private property a much larger percentage of the property than would be the case under the present law. What excuse do the Government give for such a scheme? They propose to apply Subsection 2 of Clause 3 to the lay impropriate tithes as well as to the ecclesiastical tithes, with the result that this private property will be reduced by a further 25, 30, or 40 per cent. in future. During the twenty years he had been in this House he had never heard such a monstrous proposition. So peculiar was this tithe that the man who was paying it might be twenty times as wealthy as the man who was receiving it. It might be the Duke of Devonshire who was paying the tithe, and it might be some very poor widow who was receiving it. Without rhyme or reason or just cause it was now proposed to cut down the value of this private property. He waited with much curiosity to hear the excuse the Government would put forward for this extraordinary proposal.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 5, at the end of the clause, to add the words, 'Provided always that owners of lay impropriate tithe rent-charge may elect to have the tithe payable to them varied according to the provisions of the present law' "—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said the hon. Member should remember that the Government had been obliged to touch the tithe problem in consequence of the difficulties to which reference had been made, and partly in consequence of the hardships which the Acts of 1869 and 1872 threw upon the tithe-owners. Having been compelled to deal with the question and to recognise the indefensibility of the existing system of variation, the Government determined in consequence of the many difficulties in the way to reform the whole system. This had been done by means of this Bill, and he could not allow any exception like that suggested by the hon. Member in the Amendment.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said the right hon. Gentleman had referred to two alterations by statute in regard to lay impropriate tithes, but he wished to point out that those alterations were made at the earnest supplication of the lay impropriators themselves. He knew that hon. Members from Ireland sometimes attacked great interests, but on this occasion they were defending the rights of property the owners of which were poor people. To them every single farthing was of very great consequence. Every Irish lawyer must recollect, if he had not forgotten his law, that lay impropriate tithes used to form a very important part of Irish marriage settlements. The amounts were generally not more than £1,500 or £2,000, but these tithes were adopted as securities because they were a first charge upon the land, and they formed a capital security to those persons to whom every single farthing was of importance. What did the right hon. Gentleman propose to do? He proposed to render that which was now secure insecure. This was a perfect invasion of the law of property. The owner of lay impropriate tithes was a poor man, and the person benefited by this proposal was a rich man. This variation according to the fixed standards of the price of wheat and oats had prevailed since 1838, and that value had been understood, and now a reduction was proposed in that property which was not called for in any way. Unfortunately he did not believe hon. Members opposite had read this Bill, for it would be an insult to their intelligence to assume that if they had read it they would vote for it. Up to the present time lay impropriate tithes had been considered as good a security as the National Debt, and there was no excuse for this proposal. If the First Lord of the Treasury understood it, as he does not, he would say that there was no excuse for attacking private property in this way. He (Mr. Swift MacNeill) was delighted to pose for once as the defender of the rights of property. The money invested in these tithes belonged to the very poor, and it was a monstrous thing to disturb the value of that property in this manner. This was a miserable attempt to rob the very poor. They must recollect that the second portion of this very atrocious section applied to lay impropriate tithes. The excuse for doing this was that the old system of revising upon the standard of wheat and oats had failed. Why had it failed? Simply through the folly and malfeasance of the Government themselves, who had not published the prices in the Dublin Gazette. He thought the Amendment proposed by his hon. friend was a just and reasonable one, for it simply gave the owners of these lay impropriate tithes the option of having their tithes revised in accordance with the system which had prevailed for more than two generations. Lay impropriate tithes were held by individuals, as distinguished from ecclesiastical tithes, which were held by the Church. He hoped his hon. friend would go to a division, for a more unconscionable attack upon private property he never heard of before being proposed from the Front Bench. It was all the more unconscionable because it was going to attack the poor for the benefit of the rich, and it was an attack made in the interests of the landlords. A more revolutionary measure he had never heard of.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): This Amendment is one of a totally different character to others which have been moved. It appears to me to be an Amendment which I should have supposed, from my knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, he would either have accepted or would have expressed his regret at not being able to accept. I confess I was astonished to hear from him a speech so irrelevant and flippant in answer to a complaint made in very moderate terms, that it shows that the Bill is in the hands of a man who wishes to carry it through without giving himself the intellectual trouble of seeing how it will operate. I am not given to using language of this kind, but I use that language in this case because, knowing the great intellectual ability of the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot think that he was honouring this Committee in treating us to that speech. I am going to put as plainly as I can, and without the use of any language that might aggravate, the meaning of this Amendment and the claim for its acceptance. Tithes always were a charge on the gross produce of the land. They passed into the hands of private persons, and they were bought and sold with well-defined legal rights, namely, rights to such and such a proportion of the gross return of the land. The difficulty of collecting them made the owners willing to alter the shape but not the nature of their right, and consequently Tithe Commutation Acts were passed not only with the consent of the payers of the tithes, but at the earnest desire of the receivers. Gradually the tithes got into more definite form, until at last they came to be a certain number of quarters of certain agricultural produce the price of which was fixed in a specified way, and they were paid not in kind but in money. In that form they passed into the hands of persons whose fate is in our hands to-night. Large quantities of tithe passed into public hands and the Legislature felt it might deal more freely with them, and they were commuted for a fixed payment gladly accepted by the landlords. But the Legislature did not touch the tithes which had passed into private hands and which were the subject of definite legal rights. Now we come to the cry of the landlords who pay tithes that are in public hands that they would like the fixed impost they had gladly accepted in lieu of the variable demands on them changed, and the Government has decided that it must be changed. It is going to be altered in this way. If judicial rents have gone down, then this fixed impost is to be put down also. But how about those who have no fixed impost? Their returns have also been going down, because the price of the produce on which the tithe was based has been going down, and now it is proposed to strike these tithes down again, because in consequence of produce going down rents have also gone down. Is it just that they should be punished twice? They have already borne the consequences of the fall of wheat and oats, and now you are going to reduce them still lower because the fall of wheat and oats has affected rents. I say that that is unjust. These tithe-owners are to be punished more severely by making them take the consequence twice over of the fall of wheat and oats. But apart from this consideration there is a special injustice in making tithes go down in the same proportion as judicial rents. Judicial rents, like all other rents, are the value of the margin between the return of the land and the necessary cost of producing that return, and that margin we know in many parts of England has fallen to nothing. The reduction in the value of a marginal return like a rent is in a far higher ratio than the reduction in the price of produce. You now propose to reduce the tithes in proportion to the reduction in rents, although these tithe-owners have already taken the consequences of the fall in the price of produce, because it was part of the bargain they entered into, and to which they loyally adhered. You are going to tell them after they have borne the burden of these bad years, that because you want to relieve the landlords of a fixed impost, you are going to reduce the returns they purchased, and reduce them in this exaggerated manner. I was going to say, "exaggerated and unjust manner," but the word "unjust" is perfectly needless, because you have no right to meddle with private property at all when no public need demands it. Hon. Gentlemen opposite display a scrupulous devotion to the rights of private property, and I do not blame them for it. These rights only ought to give way when a great public need demands it, and I am perfectly certain if this were an English Bill it would be howled down, and no one would have dared to suggest on this side of the channel that a peaceable set of proprietors of property of this kind should in face of no public need have their property altered in this way. If we are ever going to make Ireland a contented part of this realm we must be as sensitive to Irish questions as we are to English questions; and if hon. Gentlemen opposite deliberately shut their ears to the plain and simple demand that these people should be allowed to enjoy that which they have purchased, it will confirm that belief in Ireland—which is the greatest difficulty we have in uniting it heartily with our great country—that no one cares a button whether an injustice is done to Ireland or not.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): The hon. and learned Gentleman could not have spoken with greater confidence if he had known something of the subject. It has been my fortune, good or ill, to have had to devote some study to the tithe question in Ireland, and to have listened to remarks upon it by various speakers, and I can confidently say that I never heard anyone approach the subject in such blank ignorance as the hon. and learned gentleman. This Amendment, which, by the way, the hon. and learned Gentleman did not read to the House, and which I do not think he could have read, even for his own private information, gives the tithe-owner the option of selecting either the system set up in the Bill or the existing system; but the hon. and learned Gentleman does not know that there is no existing system in Ireland.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting the Amendment, which evidently he has not read. There is not a word in it about the existing system; it only refers to the existing law.

MR. ATKINSON: I take it for granted that what is meant by that is the existing system. If that is so, it means that, instead of the system set up in the Bill, the tithe-owner should be allowed to select the existing law, which gives him no relief, and cannot give him any relief unless it be revised. The reason it gives no relief is because, according to the existing law, when revision is brought about, you compare the price of either wheat or oats mentioned in the certificate with the average price of wheat or oats for the seven years preceding the date of the application; but such average prices have not been kept since 1879, and therefore, if they were set on foot now there would not be the material on which to work for a revision under the existing law for the next six years. The hon. and learned Gentleman was not aware of that, but that is the fact notwithstanding. Therefore, when an Amendment is proposed that an option should be given to the tithe rent-charge payer of taking the system set up by the Bill or the existing law, it is really no option at all. I doubt whether the hon. and learned Gentleman ever heard of the Act of 1824, of Goulbourne's Act of 1832, or Stanley's Act of 1838, because he appeared to me to talk as if tithes in Ireland were as they are in England, subject to revision from year to year. What are the facts? In 1828, the owners of tithes were forced to take a composition regulated on certain lines, whether they liked it or not, and yet the hon. and learned Gentleman speaks as if there had been no interference with tithe property. I suppose he is talking in ignorance of the legislation on the subject, because whether it was right or not there was legal interference both in 1832 and 1838. In 1838 the tithes that had been settled on Irish settlements were deliberately cut down by 25 per cent.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: With the consent of the people themselves.

MR. ATKINSON: On the contrary. In 1838 a different system of revision was adopted, because the tithes were revised according to the price of wheat or oats. Wheat or oats were not fair samples of produce, and were not fair samples of what the tithe was entitled to take. They were merely selected because the records of the prices of these two cereals had been preserved for other and entirely different purposes, and that machinery was taken as a test of revision. That is a bad system, and it has become impossible to work it owing to the fact that the officer whose duty it was to furnish these averages has ceased to exist. It is a cumbersome and difficult system, and the system which we propose is, as we think, more reasonable. It is automatic, and will produce more uniform and regular results. So far from there being an invasion of private property any more than has taken place under previous Acts, nothing can be further from the truth. Tithes have always been subject to revision, and we maintain that more justice will be done and more uniform results will be obtained under the system we propose than under the previous system.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: It appears to me from the two speeches we have heard from the Treasury Bench that the great weapon being used in defence of this indefensible Bill is to sneer at the arguments advanced on this side of the House. The Chief Secretary commenced by sneering at the arguments of the Member for East Mayo, and said he was astonished to see him stand up and protest against interference with the rights of property; but in indulging that sneer he forgot how vulnerable himself and his party are in bringing in a measure more confiscatory than any measure ever introduced into this House with regard to the private rights of property. My right hon. and learned friend who has just spoken thought fit to attempt to disparage one of the ablest, if not the very ablest, contribution to the debate we have heard during the four days the Bill has been under discussion. He felt his withers gall under the unanswerable arguments of my hon. and learned friend, because he failed to meet the gravamen of that speech, which was that without any public demand or necessity or any agitation for it, the Government are cutting away the very foundations of property which for centuries has been held in the ordinary way as any other fee simple estate. My right hon. and learned friend cannot deny that. These tithes have been the subject of settlement over and over again. They have been the subject of marriage settlements, of mortgages, and of sales; and I know, because my attention has been called to it by friends, that this Bill will inflict the greatest hardships in many respects. Jointures have been charged with these lay tithes, and if this Amendment is not carried, very great hardship will result. I happen to know a case where a lease of lay tithe was taken for a long number of years, the lessee paying a fixed rent, just as if he had taken the lease of a farm. The lessee is bound to pay that rent, whatever happens.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University): That would not be so under the Land Acts.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I am speaking of a lessee of tithe, and the Land Acts do not apply; and I would ask my right hon. friend to reserve his contributions to the debate until I have sat down. A lessee of tithe might have covenanted years ago to pay £100 a year, expecting to get £150 from the tithes. He is irrevocably bound to pay that £100 as long as his lease continues; but if the tithe is to be reduced in this way, instead of making a profit he may suffer a loss, as the tithe may pay less than £100 a year. That is only one of the innumerable illustrations which might be cited. Again, a jointure of £200 a year may be charged on a tithe worth £300 a year, and the result of this Bill will be to cut away the property on which the jointure is charged. The point of my hon. and learned friend's argument has not been fairly met, nor has the argument of the Member for East Mayo been appreciated, because that hon. Gentleman in introducing this Amendment said that it was quite true that there should be some change in the law in order to reinstate the old system of the average price of corn as the standard for adjusting the tithe. That was lost sight of altogether, and I would remind the Committee that so late as 1882 tithe in England was made to depend on the price of corn, the prices being ascertained and determined by what is called the Corn Returns Acts, and it is on the average of seven years prices of corn that the tithe system of England depends. Would the Committee listen to any change in or encroachment on that system? My right hon. and learned friend says, "Oh, but there was the Act of 1824 and Goulbourne's Act and Stanley's Act, by which a reduction in tithe was made." But my right hon. and learned friend forgets the lessons of history, and especially of the history of Ireland. In the early part of the century Ireland was almost in a state of revolution because of the determination of the people not to pay tithes which were then paid by the tillers of the soil. We have only to take up an Annual Register to see that tithe-collectors were shot by the dozen. I do not know whether my right hon. and learned friend ever indulges in a study of the history of Ireland. If not he ought to do so. Does he not recollect the famous battle in Ireland where several policemen were shot in endeavouring to force the payment of tithes? It was these events that led to the Stanley Act, and under the Act of 1838 the tithe was reduced 25 per cent. in consideration of its* being made a first charge on the land, and the tithe-owner had no longer to subject himself to the danger of being shot. He was only too glad of the change, and yet that is the Act referred to by my right hon. and learned friend as an argument in favour of this confiscatory measure. It was merely by a decision of the Court, on which there was great difference of opinion, that because the returns had not been published in the Dublin Gazette, it was laid down that there was no standard by which revision could take place. But that could have been remedied by a short Act of Parliament, or even by a clause in this Bill. Therefore the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Launceston stands completely unanswered and unanswerable; and it will be impossible now or hereafter to justify this aggression on private property, which may affect many orphans and widows, and as to the extent of which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has not furnished materials to enable the House to form a judgment, although I have seen it stated, I know not with what accuracy, that the lay tithe amounts to a million and a half a year.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: It is not my business to make any reference to the tone adopted by the right hon. Gentleman towards one of the most brilliant members of his profession in this House, when the right hon. Gentleman was denouncing the interference of an Englishman in Irish business. While attacking the hon. and learned Member for Launceston for ignorance and unintelligence in Irish affairs, the right hon. Gentleman might have done the justice to correctly state what he did say, and not put into his mouth words and principles which he did not enunciate. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman said that the hon. and learned Member for Launceston had declared that the rights of private property had never been interfered with, and then he went on triumphantly, as an answer to that, to point out that in 1824 there had been legislative interference with the rights of tithe-owners in Ireland. In the first place, the statement of my hon. and learned friend's principle was incorrect; and, in the second place, the inference which the right hon. Gentleman drew from that incorrect statement was fallacious. What my hon. and learned friend said was that the rights of private property were never interfered with in this House unless a public necessity had been shown for it. Does the right hon. Gentleman really mean the Committee to believe that my hon. and learned friend was stupid or childish enough to say that the rights of private property had never been interfered with? My hon. and learned friend never laid down any such an absurd proposition. His proposition was that when you come to interfere with private property you ought to show a great public necessity for so doing; and his object was to demonstrate that the Government were interfering with the rights of private property without showing an absolute necessity for it.

MR. ATKINSON: What I said was that there was no interference in this Bill with the rights of private property different in kind or nature from that to which tithes have been subjected from the year 1824.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: That is an entirely different point. The Act of 1824 was a very great and serious interference with the rights of tithe ownership; but then that was because there was a great public necessity for so doing. The right hon. Gentleman is quite as familiar as my hon. and learned friend with the history of tithes in Ireland. Early in the century all over Ireland the payment of tithes by the occupiers of the soil was resisted, and scenes of bloodshed and murder were frequent during that armed resistance. In 1825, the very year after the Act of 1824 was passed interfering with the tithes, Archdeacon Trench, in the county of Tipperary, raised a riot in which life was lost, because he endeavoured to sequestrate a number of geese in carrying out his right of tithe. So hot and widespread was the feeling against the payment of tithes in Ireland by the occupants of the soil, that even the collection of a few geese or a few sheaves of corn was quite sufficient to produce a riot in which blood was shed. In the face of these facts the right hon. the Attorney General has the coolness to come down here, when there is no demand in Ireland for it, no resistance of the tithe-payers, no petitions from them, and introduce a Bill following the precedents of 1824 and 1828, when the soil of Ireland was wet with the blood of the slain in the collection of tithes. The right hon. Gentleman has established the argument of my hon. and learned friend, by showing the difference between the past and the present. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to seriously consider this Amendment. He was not satisfied with a misrepresentation of my hon. and learned friend the Member for Launceston, but he actually had the courage to misrepresent the scope of the Amendment before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Amendment was in favour of the existing system. There is no existing system. Nobody used the words "existing system." Here are the words of the Amendment—

"Provided always that the owners of lay impropriator tithe rent-charge may elect to have the tithe payable to them varied under the existing law."

The existing law is not the existing system. Was it fair for the right hon. Gentleman not only to so grossly misrepresent the statement of my hon. and learned friend, but also the terms of the Amendment? The right hon. Gentleman says there is no system at the present moment. Does the law exist or does it not? Is the law suspended in regard to the collection of tithes?

MR. ATKINSON: It is inoperative.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Let us examine this startling proposition laid down by the Attorney General——

MR. ATKINSON: It is inoperative because the system by which it was to work does not exist.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman and is the Government treating us fairly in regard to this matter? Is that a candid way of dealing with us? He says the law is inoperative. Does he mean that under the existing law, owing to what occurred in connection with the Dublin Gazette, the tithe-payer cannot effect a reduction of his tithe proportioned to the prices of produce? But that is not the question we are discussing. We are not discussing the amount of money that the tithe-payer is bound to pay, but the question of the rights of the tithe-owner. Is the law inoperative in regard to them?

MR. ATKINSON: Neither the tithe-owner nor the tithe-payer can get a revision.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I think this is rather an irregular, though Socratic, method of getting at the truth. The Committee, however, ought to be grateful for once for this means of getting at the bottom of the matter. It is quite true that the tithe-owner or the tithe-payer cannot get a revision. But have the tithe-owners asked for a revision? Are we to understand from the right hon. and learned Gentleman that they have allowed the law to remain in suspense, and that the only debtors in Ireland who cannot recover their debts are the tithe-owners?

MR. ATKINSON: They may recover their debts, but they cannot get a revision.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am asking one question, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman always takes care to answer another. I did not say that the tithe-payers or tithe-owners could get a revision; but that the tithe-owners were able to recover their property. Have the tithe owners asked for a change in the law? The Government have offered no evidence whatever that they have done so. We are in this position: that because certain debtors demand a revision of their debts, the creditors are to have a revision of these debts carried in this House for the benefit of the debtors. And this is a Government which, above all the Governments of the world, pose as the defenders of the rights of property! The right hon. Gentleman says that the Government have brought in this Bill for the relief of the landlords of Ireland. But the Duke of Devonshire says that they are much better off than the landlords of England. The Government in this House contradict the Duke of Devonshire, and say that "the landlords of Ireland have a grievance, and therefore we will reduce the burden of their debts." The landlords of Ireland are usually men of vast estates and great property. But who are the tithe-owners? They are not all landlords. A very considerable number of them, if not the majority, are not landlords at all. They are small people, and tithes form the subject of jointures and marriage settlements which are passed from hand to hand like Consols. Why benefit the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Abercorn, the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Marquess of Londonderry, the Marquess of Clanricarde, and the like? I do not know whether the right hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh would be benefited by the Bill or not, but if so I congratulate him. The Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Abercorn, the Marquess of Londonderry, the Marquess of Lansdowne, the Marquess of Clanricarde, and other persons of vast possessions and princely incomes are the charitable objects of this Bill, but what about the poor small landlord? What about the young woman who married with a little fortune consisting of £100 in tithes? What about the widow with a jointure of £200 a year from tithes? Whenever I hear of the vicissitudes of fortune caused by the land war, I am deeply moved by the stories of want and suffering that have come to small landlords, some of whose wives have even died in the workhouse. Why, that is the class we want to protect—the small tithe-owners, whose income is going to be reduced from 25 to 50 per cent. in order that the Duke of Devonshire, the Duke of Abercorn, the Marquess of Clanricarde, the Marquess of Londonderry, the Marquess of Lansdowne, and the like may have a considerable reduction in the payment of their tithes. If this were a question of dealing with private property in England, a Bill of this kind would have been hooted out of the House of Commons; and if it had been brought in by a Liberal Government, such a proposal would have met with the most determined and obstructive opposition from hon. Gentlemen opposite; and if it had had the strange fortune to pass through this House—as such proposals rarely do—it would have got very short shrift and hard measure when it went to another place which is mainly concerned with the rights of property.

MR. DILLON: I wish to say a few words in reply to the right hon. the Chief Secretary; but before doing so I must express my astonishment at the attitude of the Attorney General towards the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Launceston, who has exhibited a thorough acquaintance with this measure and the subject with which it deals. The right hon. and learned Gentleman sneered at an English Member interfering with Irish affairs. Well, I wish that he would request the legions of English Members behind him to retire from the House, and then we could deal with the Bill in an intelligent way. It is monstrous that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill should adopt an outrageous tone in objecting to an English Member intelligently discussing the Bill, when he knows that his only chance of passing it is dependent on the votes of his legions of English Members, who neither understand the Bill nor listen to the debates on it, and who only came in to-night because they expected some lively scenes. The right hon. the Chief Secretary absolutely declined to argue the merits of the Amendment. The Attorney General said that in the year 1838 the tithe proprietors in Ireland were obliged to submit to a reduction of 25 per cent. They did submit gladly and willingly to the reduction, and why? Because they got a good quid pro quo. They exchanged the tithes leviable at great expense in the face of ferocious opposition at a great personal danger, for a first charge on the land just as secure as Government stock, and leviable without any expense or risk. In the present instance the Government are asking the tithe-owners to submit to an uncertain though great diminution, but they are offering them no quid pro quo whatever. The right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to give any reason for this assault on property in Ireland. He talked of the extreme imperfection of the present system, and said the Government were going to effect a general reform. This system has been in existence in Ireland for sixty-two years, and when did the Government become so keenly sensible of its defects? Only when the landlords wanted a dole! They are going to effect a general reform—a general reform which consists in a reduction of the private property of men who have given no cause of offence, and property payable by people who are, for the most part, really well able to pay it, and who in many instances are much wealthier than the people who own the tithes. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to indulge in what I must confess was cheap sarcasm about the Members on these benches standing up in defence of the rights of property, and that we never did so except where the interests of the tenants were concerned. We might make the forcible retort that hon. Gentlemen opposite show no interest in the rights of property except when the rights of landlords are concerned. I never saw a more glaring instance of the hollowness of the pretensions of hon. Gentlemen opposite than in their attitude towards this Amendment. Why do they sneer at us for our protection of tithe-owners? It is because the tithe-payers are mostly rich landowners, men of position and influence, and because the men and women who are interested in the rights of property, and for whose rights we are standing up, are poor and not influential. Then the Attorney General came to the rescue and thought he had annihilated my Amendment by pointing out that I propose to refer the payer of lay impropriate tithes in Ireland for his remedy to the present system. That is what I did not do. I referred him to the present law. The quibble of the Attorney General is perfectly preposterous and absurd. It is impossible for any man, even the Attorney General, to deny that the law exists in Ireland today and ever since 1838, giving to the lay impropriate tithe-payer the right of revision; and when I referred to the remedy under the present law I stated when moving the Amendment that my proposal would involve the insertion of a short clause in the Bill giving the right of the lay impropriate tithe-payer to use the corn average prices published by the Land Commissions in their annual Reports. I say that the wording of my Amendment is absolutely correct. It proposes, instead of setting up a new, arbitrary, and most unjust standard, whereby the property of these men can be cut and carved, that it should be referred to the law as it has existed for sixty-two years, by which revision would take place automatically, and which could be re-affirmed by a short clause in the Bill. Before the division is taken, I wish to repeat that the proposed mode of reducing the tithes of the lay impropriate tithe-owner in proportion to the judicial rents is most grotesque and unjust. It implies a widely different standard in different counties—a thing unknown to the law before. Why should the lay impropriate tithe-owner who lives in the county of Antrim, who, under the law as it stands, has suffered a reduction of 14 per cent. of his measure of oats, have the value of his property reduced by this Bill, without rhyme or reason, 30 per cent., and in another fifteen years have it cut down by another 30 per cent.? Take the county of Cork. Why should the lay impropriate tithe-payer of Cork, who might get a reduction of 50 per cent. on his tithe, be barred by this clause from getting more than 15 or 16 per cent. Never in the history of this House has a more absurd and reckless proposal been brought forward. It is perfectly grotesque in its operation, and utterly divorced from every consideration of reason or justice.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON asked why the clause had been inserted, its only object being to repeal a portion of Section 7 of the Irish Church Act. He found that the schedule of this Bill consisted entirely of Acts repealed, and among the Acts mentioned was that referred to in Clause 4, in so far as it related to the sale of tithe. It was a matter of drafting. Everything in the Act of 1872 worth preserving was the definition of the word "owner."

MR. ATKINSON said Section 7 of the Act of 1872 was a very long section, and the draughtsman determined that the form adopted in the Bill with respect to the repeal was preferable, in order to make it perfectly clear what was meant.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said it appeared that Clause 4 was not in the Bill as drawn at first. He pointed to the provision of Clause 10, and stated it was rather curious that after completing their Act they came and stated that certain sections mentioned in the schedule should be repealed. That might be an Irish way of doing business, but it certainly was not English or Scotch.

MR. DILLON said there was another point in connection with the clause to which he desired to direct the attention of the Attorney General. Of course he would be told that he was ignorant of the drafting of Bills, but if he was ignorant he wanted to be informed. The power to purchase tithes was given by Section 32 of the Act of 1869, and the Act of 1872, as far as he could remember, did not repeal the clause in the 1869 Act. What it did say was that the clause should be in substitution of so much of Clause 32 in the Act of 1869. What he wanted to know was this: Were they sure that, if the clause in the 1869 Act was not specifically repealed, the repeal of the clause in the amending Act of 1872 would not revive the clause in the 1869 Act?

MR. ATKINSON was understood to reply that the repeal of the clause in the 1872 Act implied the repeal of the clause in the 1869 Act.

MR. DILLON said he was still unconvinced that the clause in the 1869 Act would not be revived when they repealed the amending Act of 1872. He was told now by the Attorney General that Section 7 of the 1872 Act was an implied repeal, but why not make the thing clear? They had no assurance that the interpretation put upon the statute by Ministers would not be set aside by the courts of law. They might say that the repeal was implied, but they had no repeal. He was still in doubt as to whether Clause 32 of the Act of 1869 would not come into force on the repeal of Clause 7 in the 1872 Act.

MR. CALDWELL said he did not find anything in this Bill to show that it was to be read along with the other Act. It was quite usual to find in the case of an amending Act a provision that it should be read along with the other Act.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL said it should not be left to the courts hereafter to determine what the intention of the clause was. There was a great deal of ambiguity whether the sale of tithe rent-charges included the conversion of the old tithe rent-charges into terminable annuities. He thought so all along, and he thought so still. If the Attorney General preferred to leave the matter as it was, and if the hon. Member for East Mayo was right, it might be all the better, because tithe rent-owners would be able to redeem on the old system.

MR. DILLON said there was a very grave objection to that. It would enable landlords to redeem tithe rent-charges at twenty-two and a half years purchase. What the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said had greatly increased his alarm. There would be no remedy except by an amending Act if the courts should decide in that way, and he would like to see the Government that would bring in an amending Act if there was a mistake in this matter. Why not put a repealing clause into the Bill, which would remove all doubt on the question?

MR. ATKINSON said that as the matter stood now the 32nd Section of the 1869 Act would be entirely repealed if they repealed the 7th Section of the 1872 Act. Under the Interpretation Act of 1889 it was provided that where any Act which repealed another Act was itself repealed subsequently, that did not set up the law which had been originally repealed. They were now repealing the 7th Section of the 1872 Act, and that would not revive the clause which it repealed in the 1869 Act.

*MR. MOULTON said the difficulty which the hon. Member for East Mayo had was that there was no express repeal. There was no difference of intention, and he thought the Attorney General should consider the matter, and insert a clause which would put it beyond doubt.

MR. DILLON could not imagine what objection the right hon. and learned Gentleman had to make the matter clear by expressly repealing the clause.

MR. ATKINSON said the Interpretation Act which he had quoted put an end to the doctrine that the repeal of an Act revived a previous Act which it had repealed.

MR. DILLON said his whole objection rested on the fact that there was no express repeal. An implied repeal was of a doubtful character, and it was an arguable question.

MR. ATKINSON said he would consider the point by the Report stage.

Clause agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 5 stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLON wished to understand the full effect of this clause. Supposing a man was paying £10 a year of tithe rent-charge, and that ten years ago he got a reduction of £2, and he went on paying £8. Then came in the Medge decision, which declared the reduction illegal. Could the tithe rent-charge owner sue for £20 of arrears?

MR. ATKINSON said the clause set forth that the payments made would be deemed valid and sufficient in cases where the arrears had not been recovered up to the passing of the Act.

MR. DILLON said the clause would work in an extraordinary way. Suppose he was the owner of a tithe rent-charge, and that it had been reduced £2 a year—he and the tithe-payer believing that to be legal—and the tithe rent-charge payer meant only paying the reduced sum. But ten years after it was discovered that the reduction was illegal. He then served a summons on the tithe rent-charge payer for £20—the amount of arrears—and obtained a judgment order of the court of quarter sessions for the amount. If he recovered under that judgment order before the Act came into force, good and well; but if he kept the order in his pocket until the Bill passed into law, was that judgment order then nil?

MR. ATKINSON said they must draw the line somewhere. All that the clause provided was that after the Act was passed the tithe-owner should be prevented coming down on the tithe rent-charge payer to recover anything beyond what had been paid according to the last revision. But, if before the Act was passed the tithe-owners had got a judgment for the amount of arrears, then that became a judgment debt which the tithe rent-charge payer was bound to pay.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said after the explanation of the Attorney General the proper title of the Bill ought to be "A new way to pay old debts." The boon to be given by the Bill was that the offence for which there was no forgiveness was to pay your debts.

MR. DILLON thought the clause a monstrous one, and he should be obliged to divide against it.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Captain Donelan and Mr. Patrick O'Brien.

Question proposed, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLON said he did not intend to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth; but he desired to say a few words on the clause itself, which was an extreme illustration of the absurd methods of the present Government. As he understood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill, under this clause it was proposed to recover from the Church Fund £6,000 a year, and then to pay out of it £30,000 a year. The Act of 1898 had tied the whole rating system of Ireland into a knot, and under this clause further complications would be introduced.

MR. ATKINSON explained the object of the Clause. It provided as follows—

"The amount of tithe rent-charge payable by any person as from the first day of November, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Ninety-eight, shall be deemed to have been and shall hereafter be reduced in respect of every pound in value thereof :—

(a.) if the tithe rent-charge is payable out of hereditaments situate within a rural district, by one-half of the standard rate of poor rate certified under Section 49 of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, as having been levied off those hereditaments; and

(b.) if the tithe rent-charge is payable out of hereditaments situate within an urban district, by the whole of such standard rate so certified as having been levied off those hereditaments."

The last section of the clause provided that if a person had paid more than he ought to have paid a deduction might be made in the manner prescribed.

MR. DILLON wished to know how many Members of the House understood the explanation. The Attorney General had done his best to make it clear, but he had made it as clear as a London fog in November. This would be a fruitful cause of disputes. It was an illustration of the tangle into which the whole rating system of Ireland had been thrown.

Question put and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 7 stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLON said that so far as he understood the clause it was of rather an extraordinary character. He did not know the object of putting it in the Bill at all. The clause appeared to have for its object to split up without any limit or discretion in the Land Commission the liability for the tithe rent-charges. Take, for instance, a tithe rent-charge of £10 or £20, that would be split up between twenty or thirty persons, leaving each only liable for his own share. Before attempting to argue against the clause he wanted to know the object of it and the motive for introducing it.

MR. ATKINSON said the hon. Member was the first person he had ever heard of who objected to a provision for apportioning rent-charge or any other charge. To have no power of apportioning the charge gave rise to the greatest inconvenience and difficulty in dealing with property. In the case of property out of which tithe rent-charge issued which was owned by several persons, the clause enabled the charge to be apportioned according to their individual interests.

MR. DILLON said the Attorney General had abstained from explaining what motive the Government had in introducing this clause.

MR. ATKINSON said it would enable a particular owner to have the charge properly and rightly adjusted.

MR. DILLON said the right hon. Gentleman has still declined to explain what relation it had to the present Bill. He very much desired £1,000 a year added to his income—he wondered if the hon. Gentleman would introduce a Bill for that purpose. There was no justification for the clause, and it had no connection with the rest of the Bill. The clause struck at the security of all these charges. The power of apportioning the tithe given to the Land Commission was for a wholly different purpose, and to meet a great public need. The Commissioners were required to exercise that power with due regard to the security of the charge, and they rarely exercised it, though they did redeem the tithe. The radical difference between the power given the Land Commission and the proposal in the clause was that in the first case it was in connection with the great system of land purchase, and to facilitate the sale of land to occupying tenants but this proposal was objectionable and injurious because it was for the purpose of facilitating and encouraging the sale of land, not to tenants, but to others who wished to buy over the heads of tenants. He must persist in his opposition.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said the clause was not in accordance with the tenor and spirit of the Bill. It was a complete excrescence on the Bill. It was a disgraceful, mean, and cowardly fraud perpetrated in the interest of the rich against the poor.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Captain Donelan and Mr.
Patrick O'Brien.

Clauses 8, 9, and 10 agreed to.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It will be in the recollection of the Committee that on the first day in Committee on this Bill a debate arose on an Amendment standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth. It was then proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman that if the Government would accept the principle of the Amendment the discussion on the Committee stage of the Bill might be narrowed down to reasonable limits. Certainly I understood, at the time when the Government acceded to that request, that the debates in Committee would be limited. That hope has been disappointed. The discussions have been by no means narrow, but of a most extensive description. I consider, however, that the Government are bound to introduce the Amendment on the Paper, but I see no reason why in carrying out that pledge we should give an occasion for further argument of the kind of which we have had so much to-day. I do not propose, therefore, to move the Amendment at this stage, but when we reach the Third Reading the Chief Secretary will move that the Bill be re-committed, which will give the fullest opportunity for carrying out the wish expressed on Tuesday that this subject should be brought on for discussion at an early rather than a late period of the evening. I hope this view will commend itself to all parties in the House.

MR. DILLON thought that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House had been somewhat unfair to him, because although at the commencement of the discussion on this Bill the hon. Member for North Louth had indicated that if the principle of his Amendment was adopted by the Government he hoped the discussion would be concluded on Tuesday last, the hon. and learned Member for North Louth only spoke for himself. If it were a question of an honourable understanding he was perfectly prepared to justify the action he had taken. He got up immediately, and although he had every reason to be grateful to the hon. and learned Member for North Louth for the able assistance he gave and for one or two speeches he made, he said that while he did not deny the right of the hon. and learned Member to speak for himself, so far as he was concerned there was no understanding of the nature to which the First Lord of the Treasury had alluded. He had been requested by the chairman of his party to take charge of the conduct of the Bill through the House, and he had communicated, through the usual channels, with the right hon. Gentleman, and had agreed that the Second Reading should be taken on a certain date; but on being asked if the Committee stage would finish in a reasonable time he said he could give no pledge, because he regarded this Bill as one which the Irish Members should oppose by every means in their power. It was perfectly understood that the Bill was to be fought by every legitimate means, provided the Government did not make any concessions. They had not got a single concession, and that was not the way any Government proceeded if it desired to facilitate the passing of a Bill. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had not a single scrap of evidence in support of the attitude that had been taken up. He had always intended to oppose the Bill as long as he could find a foothold, unless substantial concessions were to be made. They had come to the end of the Bill, and had not been able to get a single Amendment adopted by the Government. He did not think that that was the way to appeal to the Irish Members to facilitate Irish Bills, or to encourage them to place any confidence in the fairness either of the Government or of the House. It was absurd to imagine that a Bill of this kind, full of technicalities and very badly drafted, could not be improved by any Amendment. The Irish Members, from beginning to end, had been met by the most dogged opposition to every improvement which they had suggested; and, in fact, they had been hardly treated to the ordinary civility of an answer to their arguments. The Government depended on defeating these Amendments by summoning their supporters from the lobbies and the smoking-rooms. He maintained that the effect of Clauses 2 and 3 would be to reduce the tithe rent-charge in Ireland, which by the present law was invariable, from 14th November next, from 40 to 50 per cent. in the south of Ireland, and further reduce it fifteen years hence by another 40 or 50 per cent. In May, 1896, under the Land Act of that year, the Land Commission obtained power, in the case of the sale of lands in Ireland to occupying tenants, to redeem the tithe rent-charges at twenty years purchase—the original price being twenty-two and a half years purchase, fixed by the Act of 1872. When the Chief Secretary was moving the Second Reading of this Bill he endeavoured to persuade the House that the Church Fund would be perfectly solvent, even after this Bill was passed. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether his calculations were based on the idea that there would be no more sales of land in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman replied "Yes"; that was to say that the Treasury Minute professing to show the solvency of the Church Fund was based on the assumption that the sales of land in the Land Courts would cease. But they all knew that they had not ceased; on the contrary, they were likely to increase enormously during the next seven or eight years. Every £100 of tithe rent-charge sold at twenty years purchase took £40 a year off the revenue of the Church Fund. If the Amendment he now proposed was not accepted the tithe rent-charge, which had already been reduced 20 per cent., would therefore be reduced a further 40 per cent. The effect of this, if carried, would be to bankrupt the fund in the near future beyond all question. Having given this reduction, the Land Commission should in the future be able to fix the redemption price at not less than twenty-five years purchase. He fixed that period because he did not think it was unreasonable that the tithe rent-charge, being a first charge on the land, should be put on the same level as quit rent.

New clause—

"After the passing of this Act, when the Land Commission order the redemption of tithe rent-charge in pursuance of Section 15 of The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887, the price fixed shall not be less than twenty-five years' purchase."—(Mr. Dillon.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR submitted that the clause in the Bill was sufficient to meet the necessities of the case, and he should be reluctant to introduce anything in the Bill which would have a prejudicial effect on a great number of landowners.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: The right hon. Gentleman is well aware—or he ought to be well aware, because he signalised his entry into office by giving peremptory orders to the judges—how to arrange matters.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is quite untrue.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: The statement I make I adhere to. The right hon. Gentleman wrote a letter to Judge Bewley.

*THE CHAIRMAN: That question is very remote from the point now before the Committee.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: That is quite true, and I will not pursue it; but the right hon. Gentleman has said that what I stated is quite untrue, and I wish to state that he, the very first time he addressed this House as Chief Secretary, stated that he had written a letter to Mr. Justice Bewley.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman not to go into that question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: It is only a personal explanation, Mr. Lowther, and I adhere to what I said. The right hon. Gentleman must be well aware what is the practice of the Land Commission, which is to fix the redemption at twenty years purchase. This Amendment of my hon. friend fixes the minimum at twenty-five years. I hope my hon. friend will press this Amendment. I must say that the discussions on this Bill on the part of the Government have been conducted in a manner which I never recollect in my fourteen years Parliamentary experience. I never remember such small information given, such scant Parliamentary courtesy extended to others, and such small conciliation. I have no recollection of a Bill of this kind passing through Committee without being amended by a jot or line, although we have pressed Amendments again and again. The true character of the Bill is that it is a dole to the landlords.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is reviewing the whole Bill.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I was arguing in favour of this Amendment. [Cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Members at twenty minutes past one are bad judges whether I was or was not, especially in that part of the House. I think the proposal of my hon. friend is reasonable.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR thought he was bound to say something in support of the Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman had laid down the extraordinary doctrine that land purchase was not going to proceed at a large or accelerated pace within the next few years. That was one of the reasons why the right hon. Gentleman thought that the fund would not be so largely diminished. Nobody knew better than the right hon. Gentleman that land purchase had considerably accelerated within the last few years. As a matter of fact, the whole tendency in Ireland was towards an increase of land purchase. He had little doubt that the right hon. Gentleman, if he should still be in office, would, be seen introducing a compulsory land purchase system before many years, perhaps months, were over. At present the Land Commission redeems tithe at twenty years purchase, but under the Bill the period would be reduced to fifteen years. Was not nearly every Irish Member, with the single exception of the right hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, who represented an Ulster constituency, pledged to compulsory land purchase? He asked anyone acquainted with the history of Ireland if there was a single demand which was backed up by united Ireland—by Nationalists and Unionists combined—which the House would not ultimately adopt if it did not cost the English taxpayer a penny or inflict a burden on Imperial taxation. Therefore, compulsory purchase would take its place on the Statute-book of these realms in the near future. Applying that political probability — he might say political certainty—to this Bill, it followed that, all over Ireland, the tithe rent-charge would have to be redeemed on the reduced scale. In other words, the tithe rent-charge now redeemed at an average of twenty years purchase would be redeemed at twelve years purchase; and in some parts of Ireland—notably in the province of Ulster—it would come to a vanishing point. Therefore by these links of reasoning he had proved that this Bill in its present shape would practically lead to the extinction at no distant date of the Church Fund. There was a way of preventing that evil consequence, and that was that if the tithe was to be seriously reduced, the term of purchase should be increased. His hon. friend suggested in his Amendment that it should be increased to twenty-five years purchase. He put it to men of impartial mind on either side of the House that, if the period of redemption was reduced from twenty-two and a half to twenty years purchase, the loss in many of the counties in Ireland would be from 20 to 30 per cent. He knew the Government would reject the Amendment, but he offered his hon. friend this congratulation—that the Government would not reject it on its merits. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill knew that the longer it was discussed the more it was discredited, and therefore he was anxious to prevent another stage for discussion. It might be good Parliamentary tactics, for the right hon. Gentleman had the forces of the Ministry behind him, to recommit the Bill on Third Reading, instead of adopting the ordinary course of passing the Amendment now and allowing the Bill to be discussed on Report; but he condemned that course, of which there were few examples in the history of the House, and he would give the Amendment his strongest support.

MR. DILLON thought that the Chief Secretary in his last speech had distinguished himself quite as much as in his previous speeches. He had been obliged to admit that the Land Commission ought to charge 22½ years purchase for the redemption of the tithe rent-charge, but he airily assumed that the Land Commission, which was carefully packed, had been pressing and badgering the Government to reduce the rate from 22½ years to twenty years. They had, in fact, been at that game for twenty years past, and at last they had got the Treasury to allow them to reduce the period of redemption from 22½ to twenty years. But could the right hon. Gentleman point to a single case in which the tithe rent-charge had been redeemed at more than twenty years purchase? The right hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that they never redeemed at the maximum of 22½ years, and that their unbroken practice was to allow redemption at twenty years.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Schedule agreed to.

Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report the Bill without Amendment to the House."

MR. DILLON said he thought the conduct of the Government on this occasion was entirely without precedent, and it was exceedingly unfair to those taking part in the debate. He maintained that it was not in accordance with the usual practice of Ministers in charge of Bills to resort to dodges of this kind. The Minister in charge of the Bill, in pursuance of a promise, placed on the Notice Paper of the House a new clause. He thought the right hon. Gentleman was bound to move that new clause unless there was some fair reason for not doing so. When the time came for moving the new clause, the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill did not rise in his place at all, but the Leader of the House intervened and took the matter out of his hands. The Leader of the House proceeded to make a statement in regard to certain understandings, the accuracy of which was open to question; but whether accurate or inaccurate, it did not afford justification for the extreme and unprecedented course the Government had taken in this case, in withdrawing the new clause which was placed on the Paper in pursuance of a promise. The clause was withdrawn for the purpose of avoiding the Report stage, and the Government had resolved to adopt the extreme course of re-committing the Bill for the purpose of inserting this clause, which they could easily insert now. He never heard of such a thing being done before in the House of Commons. He did not believe anything of the kind ever was done in the House of Commons, and as the only means of protesting against such treatment, he proposed to divide the House on the motion that was now put.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said it would be in order now to make a general review of the Bill, but as he was strong, he would be merciful. He would not do so, looking to the early hour of the morning. He thought the Government might have yielded to the Irish Members some of the small Amendments they had proposed. He did not recollect a Bill of this magnitude being pushed forward against the opposition of the Irish Members without even one comma being altered to suit their Amendments. He protested against the whole method in which the Bill had been introduced and pushed through the House. Every clause was a Chinese puzzle, and some of the clauses two or three Chinese puzzles combined. He protested against this Bill, because it was simply for the purpose of taking money out of the pockets of the poor and putting it into the pockets of the rich.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is now discussing the merits.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said he would be equally out of order in discussing the demerits. He did not know that he could do more than protest against the Bill. He was not allowed to discuss its merits or demerits, and under the circumstances discussion became a difficult matter.

MR. FLYNN said it was most uncandid on the part of the Government, after the pledge which was given, that the new clause should now be withdrawn and relegated to a stage subsequent to the Third Reading. He was under the impression that the First Lord of the Treasury gave the Irish Members to understand that this clause would have been brought in at a reasonable time on the Committee stage of the Bill, so that they might have an opportunity of discussing it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said the Leader of the House had that night established a precedent as to the conduct of business in the House. He thought he was correct in saying that the right hon. Gentleman had done something which had never been done before in the many centuries of the existence of that assembly. It was very true that Bills had been recommitted on the Third Reading, but in all such cases, at least in all the cases he was familiar with, the recommitment of the Bill on the Third Reading had been regarded as a somewhat violent and unusual proceeding, only to be justified by the fact that there had been an oversight, quite inevitable, and that the insertion was necessary to the proper force and authority of the Bill. The Leader of the House had that night announced that a certain Amendment which stood on the Paper in the name of the Minister in charge of the Bill would not be moved, and that instead of adopting the ordinary and regular course of introducing the Amendment on the Report stage, he would ask that the Bill be recommitted on the Third Reading. In other words, the right hon. Gentleman had violated all Parliamentary precedent and the traditions of centuries for the purpose of saving a stage of this Bill. He was quite conscious of the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman in the responsible position he held as Leader of the House, especially at this time of the year, and the duress he must feel in regard to time. He was rather astonished at the right hon. Gentleman giving so much time to this Bill. He did not know whether it was on account of affection for the Irish landlords or a feeling of affection for the particular Minister who happened to be in charge of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had given at this time of year an unparalleled amount of time to a Bill of this kind, and that was the reason why he grudged an additional moment's time. He sympathised with that feeling, but he thought the right hon. Gentleman might have regarded something higher than even the claims of fraternal affection and the saving of the time of that House, and that was the preservation of the unbroken traditions which were necessary to the good conduct of the business of the House. He warned the right hon. Gentleman that the precedent was rather a dangerous one for a Conservative Minister to make and offer to gentlemen of other political opinions, who might find in his action a very useful precedent for accelerating the course of legislation.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (SPITALFIELDS MARKET) BILL.

*LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, I have been deputed on the unanimous desire of the Parliamentary Committee of the London County Council to move the motion standing in my name, for the recommittal of this Bill. It is a very unpleasant task to have in any way to impugn the action of one of your Lordships' Committees, and I hope I shall perform my task in a way that will not give any offence to anyone. I hope it is not necessary for me to tell the noble Earl the Chairman of the Committee, and his colleagues, that I do not for a moment impute anything in the nature of partiality to the Committee in the course they have adopted. This is no mere form of words. I am absolutely certain in my own mind that they came to the consideration of this Bill with every desire to do complete and substantial justice between everybody concerned. I would say in the first place that the action the Committee took was most unusual, and I think I might call it almost unprecedented. What the Committee did was this: They decided against the Bill after having heard the promoters, and the evidence of the promoters, solely on the opening speech of the counsel in opposition to the Bill. That is a very unusual course to adopt. The circumstances of this case make it extremely inexplicable to me and very mysterious why the Committee should have adopted that course. Now, my Lords, I quite understand that sometimes the Committee may adopt that course—that a prima facie case that appears to be a good case may be made out, and that the opposing counsel may make criticisms on the case and on the evidence of such a nature as to convince the Committee that what they thought was a good case was in point of fact a bad case. As regards this particular case, I think there is very little doubt that the promoters did make what the Committee considered a good prima facie case. At all events, it was a case good enough to satisfy the House of Commons Select Committee, with Sir William Houldsworth at its head, and clearly the noble Lords who composed this Committee considered that a prima facie case had been made out, because they asked the opposing counsel to make his speech. Now, my Lords, if the counsel opposed to the Bill had merely contented himself with commenting upon the speeches and the evidence produced in support of the Bill, I could have understood the course that the Committee took; but the counsel against the Bill was not content with that very dull and prosaic method of proceeding. He took very high flights of imagination; he produced before your Lordships' Committee as facts that were uncontroverted and incontrovertible, facts that were very much in dispute; he raised to the position of axioms certain statements which he took for granted all through his speech—statements which had been completely riddled and disposed of in the House of Commons by the cross-examination of his own witness. That is my case, and I do suggest that there were two courses open to the Committee which they might have taken, and to which I could have taken no exception. One course was to disregard these statements of so-called facts utterly unsupported by evidence, because he called no evidence. The second course was, if the Committee were impressed with those statements of fact, to ask him to produce his witnesses in order that he might substantiate those statements. But the Committee did neither. Apparently these statements made a considerable impression on them, as they decided in his favour when he sat down, without hearing any evidence. My point is that the case was judged on an insufficient investigation of the whole matter, and that if the investigation had been carried, as I think it ought to have been carried, a little further, very likely the result might have been different. The Committee did not for a moment suggest that any further evidence was required. Now, my Lords, the very short facts in connection with this case, so far as it is necessary to refer to them—and I refer to them, not in order that your Lordships' House may retry the case, but in order to support my contention that the Committee came to their conclusion after insufficient investigation — were these: This Bill was a Bill to enable the London County Council to buy Spitalfields Market—market rights and all. The market in question had been in private hands for more than 200 years. It was a market entirely outside the City boundaries, and in a corner of what will hereafter constitute the new Borough of Stepney. The object that the London County Council had in wishing to buy, was that this market had outgrown its bounds, and had become a very serious nuisance to the neighbourhood. Your Lordships' House decided that this was a market as it is legally called, without metes and bounds, and being a market without metes and bounds, it had a right to spread itself for the purposes of the market over the public thoroughfares, and to create a nuisance which nobody could stop. The Home Secretary was applied to, the magistrates were applied to, and they said that there was no redress. Now, this market is practically under the control of one man, a lessee, who has more than sixty years of his lease to run, and he can do as he pleases. All the local bodies, without any objection—perhaps I ought to except the City, which does not appear to have taken any interest in the matter at all—but all the local bodies who interested themselves in this question of the market objected to the market remaining in private hands; there is no doubt about that; and most of the neighbouring local bodies wanted the London County Council to buy. On that point I would like to say this: that the localities principally affected by the market are Shoreditch and Bethnal Green, and not any part of the new Borough of Stepney, in a corner of which the market happens to be. Shoreditch and Bethnal Green have kept pressing the London County Council to do something to abate this nuisance, and preferably to buy the market. With regard to the new borough of Stepney there are five constitutional local bodies which will constitute that new borough. Of those five constituent local bodies three back up Shoreditch and Bethnal Green in wishing the London County Council to buy. The other two local bodies that will compose the new borough of Stepney, wish, not that the market shall remain in private hands, but they think that, on the whole, it will be desirable that the new borough of Stepney should have control of the market rather than the London County Council. But we have a vast majority of feeling on the part of the bodies most interested in favour of the London County Council buying. After long negotiation the London County Council arranged to buy out the freeholders for the sum of £177,000, and they arranged with the leaseholder to buy him out under the Lands Clauses Act. Under these circumstances the London County Council brought in their Bill to carry these agreements into effect. The City brought in a counter proposition, that was heard before the House of Commons, offering to buy the market themselves on the terms on which it was offered to the London County Council, not because they wished to run the market themselves, not because they considered there was a nuisance to be abated, but in order to prevent the London County Council having control of it, and for the further object, as they stated, of transferring this market to Stepney on terms that had not been settled if Stepney should wish to have it. Well, it is extremely unlikely that Stepney will wish to have it, inasmuch as three out of the five local authorities that will comprise the new borough of Stepney have given evidence in favour of the London County Council having the market; and Stepney, moreover, did not oppose in the House of Lords. Consequently it seems to me to be extremely improbable that the new borough of Stepney will wish to take over this market. In the Commons the matter was fully argued as between the London County Council and the City. Sir William Houldsworth was in the chair, and the result, after argument and hearing witnesses on both sides on the question, was that the House of Commons Committee rejected the City Bill and passed the London County Council Bill. Now it would have seemed that this Bill came up to the House of Lords under far more favourable circumstances than it came up to the House of Commons, because in the House of Commons we had a great many local authorities opposing on preamble with a view to getting clauses, whereas in the House of Lords the City alone was the opposer, and the House of Commons, having decided against the City, the alternative before the House of Lords Committee was this —not whether the London County Council or the City should have this market, but whether the market was to remain in private hands, or whether it was to be in the hands of the only public body that had brought in a Bill that had been passed by the House of Commons. Now, my Lords, the peculiar part of this case to which I would draw your Lordships' attention is this: that the evidence relied upon by Mr. Littler, the counsel for the City before the House of Commons, to substantiate his case, utterly and completely broke down, and it so utterly and completely broke down that the cross-examination of his witness was an important factor in our case before the House of Lords Committee. Naturally enough, in opening before the Lords' Committee, the counsel for the London County Council referred to the discomfiture of the only witness that the City produced, namely, their town clerk, Sir John Monckton. Directly Mr. Worsley Taylor, for the London County Council, tried to refer to the evidence of Sir John Monckton in the House of Commons, Mr. Littler took strong exception to any reference being made to the evidence of Sir John Monckton. Mr. Littler said—I am quoting from page 8 of the Lords' Report—

"I am bound to say that when we are here in a fresh inquiry in one House, I do protest, unless there is some special reason for it, against going into what took place in the other House. Your Lordship will hear what my friend has to say here——

"Mr. WORSLEY TAYLOR: May I take it that my learned friend is going to call the town clerk?

"Mr. LITTLER: You 'may take' nothing from me; I never bind myself to bargains of this kind. But you may take it as a general principle which has been accepted many times, sometimes against me and sometimes at my instance, that if you want to prove what has taken place before another Committee you ought to call the witness who gave the evidence in question, and not read something that somebody said elsewhere, and only a part of that. If my learned friend is going to refer to Sir John Monckton's evidence, he must read the whole of it; and if that is done—well, how will your Lordships' time be occupied? I do think my friend must steer his case his own way, but I do protest.

"The CHAIRMAN: Shall we have Sir John Monckton?

"Mr. LITTLER: I do not know whether Sir John Monckton is here at the moment.

"Mr. WORSLEY TAYLOR: If my friend tells me he is going to call Sir John Monckton, I will not say one word more about it.

"Mr. LITTLER: I am not going to pledge myself as to whether I will call Sir John Monckton or not; but you may take this as a general principle, and I shall ask my Lords to follow it, that it is not right to read the evidence of a gentleman who can be produced. My learned friend had better rely on what he says before your Lordships."

Then, after a further wrangle, Mr. Worsley Taylor says—

"I say again if I were certain that my learned friend would not take the course of simply relying on his speech, and so prevent our having the chance of cross-examining his witness and relying on him; if I were satisfied of that I would leave it at once."

Then there is a further wrangle, and Mr. Worsley Taylor retires worsted. He says—

"I desire to avoid discussion of this kind; I will not say one word more; I will leave my learned friend to put his reasons before your Lordships; I will substantiate my case by my evidence, and if he does not call Sir John Monckton, then I shall ask your Lordships to remember what has taken place. There I will leave it."

Then on another occasion Mr. Worsley Taylor tried to refer to Sir John Monckton's evidence, and Mr. Littler again tries to prevent any reference to it. Mr. Littler says—

"My strict rights are that if he wants to prove what Sir John Monckton's views are about the case he must call him in the ordinary way; he is alive and well. I will not go beyond the regular course, and I am bound to stand upon that in this case after the way in which I have been treated here. I certainly do object, my Lord, to any reading of any statement that any gentleman has given who is alive and well and can come before your Lordships.

"Mr. WORSLEY TAYLOR: This is the very first time, my Lord, I have ever heard that an admission made by a witness called by the opposite party in the other House might not before this tribunal—as before every other—be referred to.

"Mr. LITTLER: The evidence was given on another Bill.

"Mr. WORSLEY TAYLOR: Oh! my learned friend surely will not take the technical point that it was on another Bill.

"Mr. LITTLER: I do; I am perfectly entitled to do it."

My Lords, I have said that Mr. Littler made various statements in the course of his speech that had nothing whatever to do with, or, at all events, were not confined to, criticisms of the evidence and speeches of counsel on the other side, but in which he advanced on his own account certain propositions. I will only deal with one of those propositions in order to illustrate my meaning. Mr. Littler's contention all through his speech was that the City was the market authority, not only for the City of London, but for London within seven miles round St. Paul's. He says on pages 20 and 21, and in other parts of his speech, "The City are the market authority at the present moment," and he "objects to setting up another market authority," and so on. Well, if the learned counsel thought fit to take that line, and to contend that the City was the market authority for seven miles round St. Paul's Church, when the evidence on which he tried to make out that proposition broke down before the House of Commons, it does seem to me that Mr. Worsley Taylor was justified in supposing that your Lordships' Committee, if they thought there was anything in Mr. Littler's contention, would have insisted on his calling witnesses to support that contention, and certainly would not have decided against him unless they had heard a witness in support of that contention. Now, I think it may be taken as being a rule almost without exception—I have heard it so stated by persons who are perfectly conversant with proceedings in Parliamentary Committees—that when an opposing counsel, after a strong prima facie case being made for a Bill, refuses to call evidence to contradict the evidence that has been given by the promoters, that action on the part of the learned counsel is almost invariably by Private Bill Committees interpreted in one way and one way only; that is to say, it is considered as equivalent, in sporting language, "to throwing up the sponge." The learned counsel for the London County Council thought that if the Committee should be against him simply on the speech of Mr. Littler, the Committee would naturally ask that Mr. Littler should produce his evidence, and on this, and I think fairly natural assumption, he thought he might safely avoid further unpleasant wrangles with Mr. Littler. I do not think I need labour the point as to how extremely damaging to the City the evidence of Sir John Monckton was in the House of Commons, and probably would have been in this House had he been called. The pertinacity with which the City counsel fought every attempt to refer to his evidence shows how damaging he thought it would be to him. In fact when he was cornered he had to assert that he stood on his strict legal rights, and would take every objection that he possibly could in order to prevent that evidence being brought before the Committee. I say then that Sir John Monckton's evidence was essential to the formation of a right judgment, and that the Committee should not have been satisfied with the very strange reason given by Mr. Littler for not calling Sir John Monckton. The reason given by Mr. Littler is this, in his own words, quite at the end of his speech. He says—

"Now, my Lord, I do not see that any good object would be gained by calling before you any witness in this matter"—

Mr. Littler, of course, knew that if he called no witnesses he would have the last word—

"If I thought it would I would call Sir John Monckton. It does so happen that this week is the week of the meeting of the Common Council, when he is exceedingly occupied—exceedingly engaged; but if he could assist you at all I should be very pleased to call him before you. This is a matter of history and of evidence given before you of our legal position under the Act of Parliament, and no dozen witnesses could assist you in relation to it, and therefore I do not think, having regard to the length of time that this case has taken, I should be justified in taking up your Lordship's time by calling evidence which would really only, after all, be repeating in the witness-box argument and not giving evidence as to fact."

Well, it was an ingenious way of getting out of calling his witnesses, but I must say that I do not think that that is an excuse that the Committee ought to have considered satisfactory. Now, my Lords, it appears to me that it would set a very bad precedent if this was the final stage of this Bill. It would set a bad precedent of a Committee relying solely on the unsupported statements of counsel who call no evidence. I think sometimes counsel are disposed even now under present circumstances to make somewhat haphazard and unfounded statements on behalf of their clients which they would find some difficulty in establishing, and if the promotors of a Bill are to have their Bill rejected simply on the statements of fact that are made by opposing counsel, it does appear to me that a great strain will be put on the consciences of a good many counsel to place facts in a way that is not perfectly just to the Committee. I think that in this particular case there is a special reason why your Lordships should look farther into this matter. In this particular case there was not only this, that the learned counsel refused to call any evidence, but there is on the notes in the other House strong reason to believe that the reason why he did not call evidence was that he knew that it would be extremely detrimental to his case. If Bills are to be rejected on the statements of counsel who there is good reason to believe do not call witnesses because they are certain to break down under cross-examination, then it appears to me that justice is not likely to be done. Now, my Lords, this is a serious matter to the London County Council, because the agreement to buy this market lapses if it is not carried into effect this year. Last year they made a somewhat similar agreement, and your Lordships threw out that Bill, and that delay has cost the London County Council £7,000. There was a substantial reason, I think, for your Lordships throwing out the Bill last year, inasmuch as it was not a complete Bill. It only gave the London County Council power to acquire land and did not give them the market rights, and what the House of Lords Committee said was this; that they considered the London County Council ought to make a complete case; that they ought to buy up the market rights as well as buy up the land. The delay of a year has cost us £7,000. It is impossible to forecast what another delay may not cost. The nuisance is great. No local authority but the City is in favour of this market remaining in private hands, and while it does remain in private hands there can be no abatement of this serious nuisance.

Moved, "That the Bill be recommitted." —(The Lord Monkswell.)

*THE EARL OF ERNE: I can assure the noble Lord that I readily accept his assurance that he does not intend to impute any partiality to the Committee in the decision they came to. At the same time I must point out that he is entirely wrong in supposing that there was any informality whatever in the procedure before the Committee. The case was opened in the usual way by counsel, and the promoters of the Bill called their evidence, which, I may say, did not satisfy the Committee. The counsel for the opponents then made their statement, and did not call evidence, and the counsel for the promoters were thereby precluded from making any reply. The room was cleared, and the Committee decided in the usual way. I do not see how we could have acted other than as we did, unless we had thrown out the Bill after the evidence of the promoters was concluded without hearing counsel at all. I understand from the noble Lord that his object in making this motion is to elicit from me, as Chairman of the Private Bill Committee to which the Spitalfields Market Bill was referred, a statement of the reasons which actuated us in throwing out the Bill. I shall be very happy to give him those reasons, and I shall be able to do so in very few words, because the point was a very narrow one, although the consequences, if the Bill had been passed, would have been far-reaching. The market powers of the City of London are of very ancient origin. They were conferred by a Charter of Edward III., and there was no attempt in the evidence to prove that those powers had been in any way misused or misapplied. I believe it is matter of notoriety that the markets which are under the direct control of the City are models of all that market management should be; I believe they are unequalled anywhere in the world. This being so, the London County Council come forward and practically attempt to supplant the Corporation as market authority. If we had passed this Bill there is no question that it would have been taken to have been a precedent, and that the wedge, the thin end of which we had permitted to be inserted, would have been very soon driven home in subsequent Parliaments, until the Council had completely superseded the Corporation as the market authority. It was admitted that this was the first market that they had attempted to get hold of. Of course, it was admitted that they had no powers to get it in the Act which constituted them, and could not get them without coming to Parliament for the purpose. The Committee expressed no opinion whatever as to whether this change was desirable. For aught we knew, it might have been a desirable change or it might not, but what we felt, and felt very strongly and unanimously, was that a change of this far-reaching nature ought not to be made by a Private Bill Committee of your Lordships' House upstairs, by five Members chosen at haphazard, with no special knowledge whatever of the subject, but that if it was made it ought to be made after full and free discussion on the floor of the Houses of Parliament. That was the reason why we determined that we would not proceed with the Bill. I think there is another point that I should mention, although I do not say that it would have weighed with us in rejecting the Bill. This was a Bill which proposed not only to acquire the markets, but also to remove the obstruction in the neighbourhood caused by the market. Although that was the professed object of the Bill, there was no power taken in the Bill to acquire adjoining property. We thought that that was a very grave and serious omission, but, as I said before, I do not know that that would have been sufficient to justify us in rejecting the Bill, and we rejected it entirely on the grounds that I have stated to your Lordships.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, I should like to say one word, not, of course, on the merits of the question, of which I have no more knowledge than any one of your Lordships. I quite understand my noble friend opposite, to whom, as a member of the London County Council, this subject is one of great interest, calling upon your Lordships to take this step, but to recommit a private Bill that has been carefully considered by a Private Bill Committee is a very rare and most unusual step to take. I remember no case in which it has been taken, except where it was alleged that the Committee had refused to hear evidence either for or against the Bill. Where a Committee have refused to do that, the Bill has been recommitted on the ground that evidence had not been produced to satisfy them. In this case nothing of the kind is stated. It is quite true that the counsel for the opposition took the somewhat astute course of not calling evidence, but surely the counsel has to manage his own opposition as best he can, and I think your Lordships must give the Committee, which was an experienced Committee, and their chairman, who is a very experienced chairman, credit for being able to take the statements of counsel at what they are worth. If they had had any doubt about those statements, I take it that they would have given them no more credit than they thought they were worth. Of course that is quite a different thing to a counsel who calls evidence and confirms that evidence by having his witnesses cross-examined. My Lords, under these conditions it does not appear to me that there has been any irregularity in the proceedings of the Committee, or that the Committee refused to listen to any evidence which was tendered to them. As to the wisdom or unwisdom of their decision, of course I say nothing; I know nothing of the facts of the case; but under these conditions, as the matter seems to have been discussed before them in the only way it could be discussed, I venture to think it is hardly a case for taking so strong a measure as recommitting the Bill.

*LORD MONKSWELL: Of course I shall not attempt to divide the House after the opinion expressed by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees on the matter, but with regard to this question of market authority there is a good deal to be said. The noble Earl, who was chairman of the Private Bill Committee, has put it simply from his own point of view. My statement would be this, that if the noble Earl had had the advantage of hearing Sir John Monckton, it would have been elicited that this claim of the City to be the market authority is an absolutely antiquated claim, and is certainly, as the noble Lord knows, quite contrary to the "Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existing state of the Corporation of the City of London, and to collect information respecting its constitution, order, and government, etc." That Commission was appointed in 1854. The Commissioners refer to this very Charter of which the noble Earl spoke, and they say—

"The brevity of the ancient Charters, the antiquity of the language in which they are couched and the vagueness resulting from the use of concise and general expressions make it often a hard matter accurately to define their meaning. They refer often to a state of things which has wholly passed away, and their language has, therefore, to be explained often through the doubtful medium of antiquarian research. It is also often uncertain what Charters and what portions of Charters are actually in force; how far a subsequent Charter repeals or interferes with the provisions of a former Charter; a question depending upon the intentions of those who gave and received the Charter many centuries ago, and obviously full of doubt and obscurity."

"The Charters of Edward III. and Charles I. granted to the Corporation contain a declaration that no market shall be granted by the Crown to be holden within seven miles all round about the City. Whatever may be the right which these grants may be held to convey for the prevention of new markets."

That is not the case. This market was a market in private hands for 200 years. Prevention of new markets is a totally different thing.

"Whatever may be the right which these grants may be held to convey for the prevention of new markets within seven miles of the City, it seems to us unsuited to the state of things which has grown up since the reign of Charles I., and we think that any such restrictive privilege which the Corporation may now possess with respect to markets without the limits of the City should be repealed."

My Lords, I wish to withdraw my motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 10) BILL.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I ask the House to suspend the Standing Orders in regard to these Bills, and allow them to be read a second time, under these circumstances. The Bills confirming these Orders were all introduced into the House of Commons within a reasonable time, and at such a time that they might naturally have been expected to pass both Houses. Owing to the unexpected length of the Whitsuntide recess, the time for petitioning against these Orders in the House of Commons was extended to June 14th, the first day on which the House sat after the recess. One or two of these Orders were petitioned against, and the Committee to consider those petitions did not meet till the 26th June. Under all these circumstances, and as there has been no delay on the part of the promoters for which they can be in any way held responsible, I hope the House will allow the Sessional Order to be suspended in the case of these four Bills, and I believe that I have the concurrence of the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees in that course being taken.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: Yes; under the circumstances mentioned by the noble Lord, I have no objection.

Moved, That the Order of the 12th March last, "That no Provisional Order Confirmation Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a second time after Tuesday, the 26th day of June next," be dispensed with, and that the Bills be now read 2^a; agreed to; and Bills read 2^a accordingly.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, I have to ask your Lordships to accord a Second Reading to this Bill, which comes to your Lordships from the House of Commons. It is a short Bill, which is introduced to meet a difficulty which arose in reference to the Charitable Loans Act, 1843. Certain legal objections were taken to promissory notes that were current at the time owing to certain matters—non-residence, or the fact of renewals and other matters—and it was deemed right to set the matter on a clear basis by an Act of Parliament. This Bill accordingly was introduced, and it has passed all its stages in the other House. It validates bills and promissory notes subject to equitable conditions, and provides for accounts being taken where necessary on equitable terms. It gives ample power to the judge to do all that is right in a matter of ordering payment by instalments and so forth. I trust that, under all the circumstances, your Lordships will think fit to accord the Bill a Second Reading.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

TOWN COUNCILS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I rise to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill. The Memorandum which is prefixed to the Bill fairly, and I think with sufficient completeness, describes the scope and intention of the Bill. With one exception, which I must mention to your Lordships, it is perfectly accurate, and that exception is on page 2 of the Memorandum, in the fourth object. It states that the Bill is intended to assimilate the municipal and police boundaries of all burghs. That statement was accurate in regard to the form in which the Bill was introduced into the other House, but it has been found that the assimilation of boundaries would be too complicated a matter, and touch too often private interests, to be dealt with in a Bill of this kind, and therefore those provisions have been dropped. By an oversight, the statement that the Bill effects this purpose has not been deleted from the Memorandum as reprinted for your Lordships' House. In all other respects the Memorandum is, I think, accurate. My Lords, this Bill is largely a consolidation Bill. I will not say that there are not some amendments of the law, because there are some here and there throughout the Bill; but those Amendments are all in conformity with the general policy which has been adopted by Parliament for many years past—namely, to assimilate the conditions under which the government of the two classes of burghs in Scotland is carried on. This Bill is very complicated—it is full of detail; and although it has not been discussed at length in the other House of Parliament it has been very fairly and very fully considered. A very large number of Amendments have been made to meet suggestions made during its passage through the other House. It has also been considered with great care by the officers of my Department, and I have no hesitation in recommending the Bill to your Lordships for Second Reading. There are still some Amendments which will be necessary—some to protect the rights and interests of some of the larger burghs and cities of Scotland, and in one or two cases to adjust the rights of some of the counties—but with these exceptions the Bill, I think, will not cause any serious discussion, and, at any rate, I hope on this occasion your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday, the 20th instant.

LUNACY REGULATION (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

LAND REGISTRY (NEW BUILDINGS) BILL.

Read 3ª (according to Order), and passed.

RIFLE RANGES—APPLICATIONS FOR GRANTS.

*THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH: My Lords, I rise to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is now in a position to state the conditions to which applicants for a portion of the grant for Volunteer ranges will have to conform. I must apologise for again raising this subject of ranges, but it is somewhat an important one, and as I understand that now there is a further sum of £100,000 to be allocated, I should like if possible to obtain from the noble Marquess certain information as to the conditions which will have to be conformed to before applicants receive a portion of the grant; I want to know how applications are to be made, to whom they are to be made, and the conditions to which applicants will have to conform. Perhaps I may be allowed to refer back to the former sum of £40,000 voted last year, because I think I shall be able to explain the difficulty in which those who desire to obtain a portion of the grant are placed. The noble Marquess has told us that out of that £40,000 a sum of £35,000 has already been allocated. I believe I was the first to raise the question in this House, some twelve months ago, and I extremely regret to say that the only battalion in Staffordshire which has not received a portion of the grant is the battalion in which I am personally interested. The other day I received a letter from the Colonel pointing out the fact that this is the only battalion that has not received a portion of the grant, and stating that he could not understand why that is so, and also stating that he has received no communication in response to his application. He also points out, and I think he is perfectly right, that his battalion is really one that deserves, perhaps, more than any other battalion, some little assistance, because his range was compulsorily closed; he took time by the forelock, and with considerable difficulty obtained another range, which he has been engaged since that time in making and equipping. He has collected all the money he could in the neighbourhood, and he says he is still £400 short of what he wants. Now, this is not a case of an old range. I believe one of the conditions laid down as regards the distribution of this Vote of £40,000 was that no money would be given to those who were already in possession of ranges, but I would point out that in this particular case the loss of the old range necessitated the provision of a new one, and it could not, therefore, come under the description of an old range, because it was not made or equipped. Therefore, I think that a man who takes the initiative, and as soon as he possibly can obtains a range to supply the deficiency is one who ought to have assistance. Of that £40,000, as I say, £35,000 has already been distributed. I may in passing suggest to the noble Marquess that the remaining £5,000 is amply sufficient to satisfy my immediate requirements. I do not know whether it is too late, but I would venture to make this suggestion. The point I particularly want to emphasise is the fact that this unfortunate colonel has done all he can to supply the deficiency. Whether he applied to the wrong place or whether he did not conform to the rules or not, or what is the reason why he receives no assistance, he does not know, because he has received no communication in response to his application. This seems to me to be a gross act of discourtesy on the part of somebody. I have the honour of being Lord Lieutenant of the county, and I think it is part of my duty to see that the colonels of Volunteers in my county are treated with proper respect. I believe Mr. Balfour has said that the War Office is in one respect the most splendid institution in the world, because whatever goes wrong it is impossible to put your finger on anybody who is responsible; but if the noble Marquis will privately inform me who has been guilty of this gross act of discourtesy and put me into direct communication with him, I should be very much obliged. I do think it is hard on a man who has had nothing to guide him, who does not know to whom he is to apply or where to make the application, that when he makes application he receives no answer. It seems to me a very simple matter that when the communications are sent round the conditions to be conformed to should be put before the applicants, so that those who apply may know what conditions they have to conform to and to whom to make the application. I would just point out that this £40,000 which was voted last year was public money voted by Parliament. It was intended for a specific purpose, and was not, I am sure, intended to give an opportunity to the War Office to have a game of hide and seek with the Volunteer colonels throughout the country. I do trust that when this new allocation is made this information will be given to those who are principally interested.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): I think my noble friend has a little misapprehended the procedure which is followed in the distribution of these grants to Volunteer corps. Let me tell him exactly how the facts stand. We had in the first place to allocate the £40,000, which was not voted by Parliament, but which was provided in the Military Works Loans Bill. Of that £40,000, £35,000 or thereabouts has, as he truly observes, been distributed. As to that distribution our instructions to the local military authorities were that they should give the first place to those corps which were as yet unprovided with ranges. The result of that was to exclude for the time every corps which had already provided itself with a range. In that way we got rid of £35,000 out of £40,000. I believe the remaining £5,000 is already earmarked for a similar purpose, and I am afraid I cannot promise to act on the rather unblushing suggestion of my noble friend that the balance should be given to him.

*THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH: I did not ask for it all.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: With regard to the £35,000 there was certainly no "hide and seek," because I have laid on the Table of the House a statement of the manner in which the money was distributed. I now come to the further sum which I mentioned the other day as £100,000. I am glad to be able to tell my noble friend that, thanks to various circumstances with which I need not trouble your Lordships, we shall have a rather larger sum (probably about £130,000) to spend in this manner. After setting aside what will be required for the Metropolitan Volunteers, the remainder of that sum will be distributed to corps which have already, at their own cost, provided themselves with ranges. I quite agree with what my noble friend said, that those corps which took time by the forelock, and underwent considerable sacrifices in order to equip themselves with proper ranges, ought not to be left out in the cold, and they will not be left out in the cold in this distribution. They will receive, according to the circumstances of the corps, grants proportionate to the expenditure from corps funds, grants which will probably amount to about half or one-third of their own expenditure. Then as to the procedure, my noble friend evidently thinks that in these cases the War Office waits for applications from different corps, and makes its selection among the most clamorous applicants. That is not at all what is done. What has been done in regard to these distributions is this. The general officer of the district is instructed to send round an official who is known as the district inspector of musketry, and that official goes round to every corps in the district, whether an application has been received from it or not. He makes his report upon the position of the corps in regard to range accommodation, and gives advice as to the amount of assistance which ought, in his opinion, to be granted. These recommendations are collected and are sent up in a schedule to the War Office, where they are examined by a Committee known as the Ranges Committee. By that Committee they are sifted and revised, and upon the recommendations of that Committee the final distribution takes place. My noble friend will, therefore, see that it is not a question of instructing an applicant how he is to proceed. The corps have to wait until the local military authorities come to them and examine into their position, and report upon that position to the War Office. It may be that in the particular case to which my noble friend referred, an application was made and left unanswered, but he does not tell me by whom or to whom it was made. If it was not answered, or if there was any discourtesy shown, I regret it very much, and if my noble friend will give me the particulars I shall be glad to make inquiry, but I wish my noble friend to understand clearly that the corps' prospect of obtaining a share of this money does not depend on the fact of its having made an application to the War Office.

*THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH: I quite understand that, but I think it would be well if it was generally understood what the procedure is. Those who have been anxious to obtain a share of this grant have been under the impression that it was for them to make the application. Would it not be possible to let the conditions be generally known? I do not think that it is generally known by commanding officers of corps that it is not for them to make the application. I continually get letters asking me what course ought to be followed in order to obtain assistance.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I think the best corrective of that statement will be found in the procedure which is on the point of being followed at this moment, and which I endeavoured to describe just now. This officer will go round from corps to corps, and if the corps will possess their souls in patience for a few days or a few weeks, each corps will be visited by the inspector, and will be made thoroughly aware of what is intended.

House adjourned at half-past Five of the clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—CO-OPERATION OF JAPAN IN SUPPRESSING DISTURBANCES.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information to show that Japan did not at the beginning of the Chinese crisis despatch a sufficient force to restore order at Peking owing to the opposition of the Russian Government.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Her Majesty's Government are not aware of any such opposition having been made by the Russian Government.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Japan has imposed any conditions upon or attached any stipulations to the employment of her troops in North China.

*MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, etc.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will state the date on which Her Majesty's Government addressed a communication to the Government of Japan, proposing that larger reinforcements should be sent to China; and whether the terms of such communication can be laid upon the Table of the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: Communications between Her Majesty's Government and Japan respecting the increase of force required at Ta-ku began on 13th June, and they have continued without intermission. On 22nd June Her Majesty's Government addressed an urgent telegram to the Chargé d'Affaires at Tokio, instructing him to inform the Japanese Government of the critical position of the Legations, and of the large reinforcements placed under orders from India, and urging on the Japanese Government the necessity of immediate action. The papers to be laid will include these despatches.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Did Lord Salisbury offer any inducement to Japan to send reinforcements?

[No answer was given.]

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the consent of the Japanese Government to send large reinforcements to put down the disturbances in China is conditional upon the consent of all the Great Powers; and, if so, whether that consent has been given.

*MR. BRODRICK: The answer is "No."

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: To which of my two questions does that apply—the first or the last?

*MR. BRODRICK: I intended to convey that, as far as the Government are aware, there has been no opposition on the part of other Governments. The answer, therefore, applies to both questions.

POSITION AT PEKING—SIR CLAUDE MACDONALD'S DESPATCHES.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state the date of the last despatch received from Sir Claude MacDonald; whether our Foreign Office has any knowledge of despatches of a later date, sent from foreign Legations at Peking, having been received; if so, can he state the date of the latest despatch from any of the Legations at that place; and, whether any despatch known to the Foreign Office gives any information as to the steps taken, and preparations made, for the defence of the Legations and protection of foreign residents in Peking; and, if so, whether he has any objection to indicate generally the nature of such arrangements so reported.

*MR. BRODRICK: The las telegram addressed by Sir C. MacDonald to the Foreign Office was dated 12th June, three days after Admiral Seymour had landed his force. In it Sir Claude urged immediate measures, which had been already taken. I believe no telegram of later date was received from any other Legation. Despatches up to 28th May from Sir C. MacDonald were received yesterday. In one of these he describes an interview held on 27th May with Prince Ching, at which the latter stated that as Commander of the Peking Field Force he was willing personally to undertake the protection of all foreigners. It was, however, decided to send for the Legation Guards, but no assault on the Legations appeared at that moment to be contemplated.

NAVAL GUARD AT THE PEKING LEGATION.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the British Legation at Peking has any guard furnished by the naval forces on the China station; if so, what is the strength and composition of the guard detached for that service; and whether it was composed of supernumeraries to the complements of ships on the station.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes. So far as is known there are three officers and seventy-five men of the Royal Marines at Peking. In all probability this guard was drawn from the Wei-hai-wei detachment, and not from ships' complements. Fuller information will doubtless be received later.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Sir William MacCormac, who was last week the guest in Dublin of Professor Cunningham, and Dr. Jameson, the Director General of the Army Medical Department, or either of them, were consulted with reference to the appointment of Professor Cunningham as a member of the South African Commission to inquire into the charges brought against the administration of the Army Medical Department, and whether there was any communication with these gentlemen directly or indirectly with reference to Professor Cunningham's appointment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that the hon. Member will see that this is a question which ought not to be put, and, if put, one which ought not to be answered.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Am I to conclude that the answer to the question is in the affirmative, and that he is an agent of the Army Medical Department?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; the hon. Member must only conclude that the question is one which ought not to be put.

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House any information as to when he will announce the new constitution of the committee of inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope to be able to give the House the information as to the addition of the new names at a very early date; but it is not a matter easy of negotiation, nor is it to be rapidly carried through.

PROMOTIONS FOR NAVAL OFFICERS SERVING IN SOUTH AFRICA.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is intended to issue, before the end of the war, a list of promotions for naval officers who have served with the field forces in Natal or elsewhere in South Africa, similar to that issued for the officers who have come home in the "Powerful"; and whether promotions for naval officers serving with the field forces will be antedated in the case of lieutenants senior to those whose promotions have already been gazetted, so as to avoid serious injustice.

MR. GOSCHEN: The question of any Naval promotions that may be made on account of the war in South Africa will be considered when the despatch is received from the Field Marshal commanding in chief, giving the names of all officers whom he wishes to recommend. Should the Naval Brigades be withdrawn before the end of the war, their case will be specially considered. I am not prepared to answer the last question of the hon. Gentleman.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that serious injustice will be done to these Naval officers if the promotions are not ante-dated, as is suggested in the question?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member had better wait and see what is done.

STORES BORROWED BY THE ARMY FROM THE NAVY.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consent to lay upon the Table at an early date a Return showing up to 31st December, 1899, the amounts of the various classes of warlike stores borrowed by the Army from the Navy for the purposes of the campaign in South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There will be no objection to laying the Return, but some of the figures are not yet at our disposal.

SHORNCLIFFE CAMP—HOSPITAL ARRANGEMENTS — DEATH OF SERGEANT WILMSHURST.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is aware that at an inquest held on Saturday last, at Shorncliffe Camp, on Sergeant Wilmshurst, of the Sussex Regiment, it was shown in evidence that there was not a single orderly of the Army Medical Corps in the hospital, and that Wilmshurst, when taken to the hospital in a fit, died before a doctor could be found; and in view of the comments made by the jury at the inquest, whether he can say what steps, if any, are now being taken to secure without delay an adequate staff for our military hospitals both at home and abroad.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The hon. Member has been misinformed. Sergeant Wilmshurst was brought to hospital at 5.40 a.m., and was received by the orderly wardmaster, who was a Militia sergeant trained in Army Medical Corps duties at Aldershot, and by a first-class orderly of the Royal Army Medical Corps, who had served both at home and abroad, and rejoined for hospital duty as a Royal Reservist in March last. The medical officer was sent for and arrived in a few minutes. The man was unconscious when brought to hospital and evidently dying, but not in a fit. Examination after death showed extensive heart disease quite sufficient to account for the suddenness of his death. No comment or rider was attached by the jury to their verdict. The staff serving at the hospital consists of seventeen non-commissioned officers and men of the Royal Army Medical Corps, besides regimental soldiers.

CAPTAIN NORTON: What proportion of that staff is at the hospital at the present time?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The whole of it is there now, and was there on the occasion in question. The hon. Member read a completely misleading paragraph in the newspapers, for which there was not a vestige of foundation.

NAVAL MANŒUVRES OF 1899—WATER-TUBE BOILERS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of Vice-Admiral Domvile on the Naval Manœuvres of 1899; and will he in any case lay upon the Table that portion of the Report which relates to the water-tube boilers of H.M.S. "Europa."

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not propose to lay the Report of Admiral Domvile on the Table of the House, but the defects of the "Europa" during the manœuvres in question will be fully set forth in a Memorandum on Belleville boilers, which is being prepared for the discussion on Vote 8.

PAY OF ENGINEERS OF THE FLEET.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the recent increase of pay to the engineers of the Fleet is being recouped to the Admiralty by reductions in charge pay to some of the engineers both for cruisers and destroyers; whether charge pay to engineers in charge of machinery of destroyers is to be lowered from 3s. to 1s. 6d.; and whether there is a scarcity of engineers, so that it has been found necessary to place warrant officers in charge of machinery on three of the destroyers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): The answer to the first paragraph is in the negative. The maximum rate of charge pay has been reduced, and the whole scale has been recast on the recommendation of the engineer officers themselves, the net result of the changes in regard to pay and allowances of engineer officers generally being an increased charge to the Crown of £14,000 a year. The future rate of charge pay for destroyers will be 2s., and not 1s. 6d. as stated in the question. In accordance with the purpose for which the warrant rank of artificer engineer was created, these officers have been placed in charge of the machinery of a number of smaller vessels, and included in these are four destroyers of the older twenty-seven knot type. Such officers are considered as available engineer officers in the ships to which they are appointed, and such appointment is no indication of a dearth of engineer officers.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: But is it not the fact that certain individual engineer officers will receive a less payment for their services by this reduction of pay than they have hitherto received?

MR. MACARTNEY: Arrangements have been made to prevent any loss, but it is true that the maximum has been reduced to make a better distribution. Certain individuals in the future will receive less than they have been receiving hitherto.

INDIA—HONNIBAL SHOOTING CASE.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Clare, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the Honnibal shooting case, when Captain Wood, accompanied by other officers, fired into a sugar cane plantation and hit an old man; whether he is aware that a villager named Kenguri detained the officers and was afterwards sentenced to four months imprisonment on a charge of assault; whether inquiries have been made as to the injuries sustained by the old man at the hands of the officers; and whether he will lay a statement of the whole case upon the Table of the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): From information received from India, I understand that an officer while out shooting accidentally wounded a native with small shot; subsequently a crowd of villagers collected, and certain of them acted in such a manner as to induce the officers to bring an action for assault and wrongful restraint. I should add that the first acts after their release were to send a doctor to attend to the wounded man, and inform the collector of what had occurred. The result of the action at law was that a native was condemned to three months rigorous imprisonment and one month's simple imprisonment. An appeal has been lodged against this sentence, but has not yet been heard.

INDIAN FIELD BATTERIES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the reorganisation of the heavy field batteries in India diminishes either peace strength or war strength in guns and men.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The whole question of the organisation of artillery in India is now under consideration. Until a final decision has been reached, I cannot give information upon matters of detail.

COLONIAL CHAPLAINS—CHAPLAINS ROYAL.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Colonial clergymen are eligible for appointment to the dignity of Chaplains Royal; and, if so, whether any such appointments have as yet been made.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I am informed by the Lord Chamberlain, in whose Department is the appointment of chaplains to the Queen, that Colonial clergymen, members of the Church of England, are eligible and have been appointed.

PACIFIC ISLANDS—INCORPORATION OF CERTAIN GROUPS WITH NEW ZEALAND.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any decision has been arrived at on the subject of the memorandum from the Governor of New Zealand, suggesting the incorporation of certain groups of Pacific Islands within the boundaries of that colony; I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will explain how it is proposed to discriminate between the islands of the Pacific that will come within the legislative purview of the Australian Commonwealth Parliament, and those that are regarded by New Zealand as coming within her legitimate sphere of influence.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: In answer to these questions I have to state that the matter is one which must be discussed by Her Majesty's Government with the Governments of New Zealand and of the Commonwealth of Australia when it has been established.

MOROCCO — ANGLO - FRENCH ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the recent occupation of Igli by French troops is in contravention of the delimitation of frontiers treaty of 1845, concluded between France and Morocco, and is also a breach of a subsisting convention agreed to by France and Great Britain; and whether any representations on the subject have been made to France by Her Majesty's Government; if so, with what result.

*MR. BRODRICK: The question whether the occupation of Igli by French troops is in contravention of the Franco-Moorish Treaty of 1845 is one which primarily concerns the Governments of those two countries, and Her Majesty's Government do not at present feel called upon to pronounce an opinion on the subject. As I have already stated, Her Majesty's Government have no separate understanding with France in respect of Morocco. No representations on the subject of the French occupation of Igli have been made to France by Her Majesty's Government. They have, however, as I informed the hon. Member on 24th May, received assurances at different periods of the desire of the French Government to maintain the status quo.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH GERMANY—POSITION OF CANADA.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the new Commercial Treaty now being negotiated with Germany, the Dominion of Canada is specially excepted from the favourable rates therein given to the remainder of the British Empire; whether this exception is made on account of the provisions of the tariff lately passed by the Parliament of Canada giving preferential tariff rates to the mother country, and to other portions of the Empire as compared with foreign countries; and whether, in view of the loss of trade that has been inflicted on Canada by the exclusion of her products from Germany, except on unfavourable terms, the Government have given any consideration to the question whether some compensating advantage can be given to Canada.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the negotiations with Germany as to the new Commercial Treaty were proceeding on the lines that it was not applicable to any colony unless notice was given on behalf of such colony that it desired to be included. The hon. Member was probably referring to the law which had been passed by the Reichstag pending the negotiations for the treaty. Under that law Germany had not extended to Canada and Barbados the most-favoured-nation treatment for their products, for those colonies had not, in the opinion of the German Government, reciprocated. He was not aware that the action of Germany had inflicted loss on the trade of Canada, which he was glad to say had greatly increased during recent years.

GENERAL LAURIE: Has not the importation of Canadian products been forbidden in Germany, except on unfavourable terms, since Canada gave preferential rates to the mother country?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and gallant Gentleman had better put down notice of the question, as this is not a matter with the details of which I am familiar.

LIGHTHOUSE COMMUNICATION— WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

SIR R. PENROSE - FITZGERALD (Cambridge): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Interdepartmental Committee to whom the question of wireless telegraphy for life-saving purposes has been referred is a Committee appointed in consequence of the recommendation contained in the final Report of the Royal Commission on Electrical Communication with Lighthouses and Light Vessels; and whether such Committee comprises all the representatives suggested by the Royal Commission—namely, the Board of Trade, the Post Office, the Trinity House, and other lighthouse authorities, the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, and the Admiralty.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The Inter-departmental Committee to which my hon. friend refers was appointed to consider and report (a) with respect to the provision and maintenance of communication between outlying lighthouses and light vessels and the shore, and whether any, and, if so, what extension and improvement can be made therein, special regard being had to a system of wireless telegraphy; (b) how far and subject to what conditions the means of communication with such light stations can be made available for private messages without affecting the efficiency and safety of the lighthouse service; and (c) how far the connections between shore lighthouses and post offices or coastguard stations should be made available for private messages. This Committee has superseded that which was appointed in consequence of the recommendation contained in the final Report of the Royal Commission on Electric Communication with Lighthouses and Light Vessels, and comprises representatives of the Board of Trade, Admiralty, Treasury, Post Office, and Trinity House.

SIR R. PENROSE-FITZGERALD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will give instructions to the Inter-departmental Committee to whom the question of wireless telegraphy for life-saving purposes has been referred, to communicate with the German Government and the German lifeboat authorities as to the exact nature of the system in use in the Borkum light-vessel.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; the Committee will endeavour to ascertain the nature of the system of communication with the Borkum light-vessel which has been adopted.

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, does he propose to proceed with the motion for the Second Reading of the Savings Banks and Friendly Societies Bill, which substitutes a varying rate of interest for the fixed rates now payable by law to the depositors in Post Office Savings Banks; and, if so, can he say on what day the Second Reading debate will be taken.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am not in a position to say at present.

COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL—JUDGES ON JURY VERDICTS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that at the recent Assizes at Chelmsford and Worcester respectively, judges have in two cases publicly expressed disapproval of the verdicts of juries on prisoners tried before them, he will use his influence with the Government to induce them to take steps to establish a Court of Criminal Appeal; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the cases of these prisoners by way of review of the convictions.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The cases referred to are being enquired into, but I do not think that what has occurred in them is at all decisive on the difficult question as to the desirability of establishing a Court of Criminal Appeal.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS COMMISSION—HARDWICKE PAPERS.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Historical Manuscripts Commission will publish in their series of reports extracts from the Historical and Political Correspondence and Papers of the First Earl of Hardwicke, recently purchased by the trustees of the British Museum.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The Queen's authority to the Commissioners directs them to investigate manuscripts belonging to private persons, and it is clearly better that they should limit themselves to this field instead of encroaching on the work which is at present admirably performed by the officers of the Museum itself.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Then are we to understand that where valuable manuscripts are in private muniment rooms, and the nation purchases them, the nation is to be excluded from seeing them?

MR. HANBURY: The nation can see them, of course, at the British Museum.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: They cannot.

POSTAL DELAY IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a number of letters posted in closed envelopes in the E.C. district by the Bank of England and other dividend-paying agencies on 30th June and subsequent days, and containing dividend warrants and other cheques, were not delivered in districts within the metropolitan area till periods varying from twelve hours to three days after posting; and whether the new postal arrangements affect letters posted and delivered within the metropolitan area; and if not, what is the cause of these delays, and when may they be expected to cease.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General, I am informed, is not aware that any such delay as the hon. Member describes occurred; but it is probable that some of the large number of letters collected from the Bank of England on the date named were not delivered in ordinary course, because it appears to have been found impossible at the Bank to comply with the Department's request that the letters should be divided into batches for London and the provinces respectively. The new arrangements do not, as a rule, affect letters posted and delivered within the metropolitan area, but it is essential to punctual delivery that letters posted in the E.C. district in the usual way, should be put into the proper boxes according to their destination; that is to say, London letters into the London box and provincial letters into that for the provinces.

MR. COHEN: May I ask whether it is not possible to give some clearer indication on the letter-boxes as to the division in which letters should be posted; because the present instructions are invisible in the dark hours?

MR. HANBURY: Now that letters are sorted, some at St. Martin's-le-Grand and some at Mount Pleasant, it is all the more important that the right letters should be put into the right boxes. Whether the intimation to the public is sufficiently clear I do not know, but I will suggest to the Postmaster General that the public should be fully impressed with this necessity.

MR. COHEN: Are the double boxes confined to the E.C. district?

MR. HANBURY: Oh, no. They are all over London.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Does the right hon. Gentleman know that now it takes a longer time to send a letter from the E.C. district to Kensington than to Birmingham?

MR. HANBURY: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman is correct in his statement. I myself have had experience of a number of letters so delayed.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to put an end to the delay?

MR. HANBURY: It is not in my power to do so. But I will press the Postmaster General to do so.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Is there to be an extension of this system of making the public sort its own letters under penalty of delay in the delivery?

MR. HANBURY: I do not know whether it will be extended. But it is universal all over London.

AN HON. MEMBER: No.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is this system the result of the appointment of Lord Londonderry?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DELAYS IN AUSTRALIAN MAIL DELIVERIES IN LONDON.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that there have been repeated delays in the delivery of the Australian mails in London through the inefficiency of the Continental railway arrangements; and whether the Postmaster General can bring any pressure or influence to bear upon the French and Italian railway authorities with a view to securing the rapid and uninterrupted transit of the Australian mails to London.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware that on one or two recent occasions the Australian mails have sustained delay in their transmission from Naples to this country, and, as was stated in reply to a somewhat similar question in this House last week, he is making continued effort to prevent delay in this service. Representations have already been addressed to both the French and Italian Governments on the subject.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY—DUMFRIESSHIRE TRAIN SERVICE.

MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicestershire, Loughborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the service of trains between Carlisle and the local stations of the Caledonian Railway in Dumfriesshire, which frequently entails on passengers to and from stations south of Carlisle a delay at Carlisle of two or three hours before getting a train to take them to their destination; and whether, considering the obligation of the railway companies to provide reasonable facilities, he will, in the interest of the public, use his good offices with the Caledonian Railway Company to secure a better service of local trains.

MR. RITCHIE: I have been in communication with the railway company concerned in regard to the hon. Member's question, and they state that the local trains now run to and from Carlisle are as numerous as the demands of the traffic would justify. It is added that an additional train put on experimentally last year to connect with the down day express from London was made little use of. I shall be happy to show the company's reply to the hon. Member if he so desires.

FEE GRANTS (SCOTLAND) RETURN.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state the amounts paid out of the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account in respect of each of the four headings left blank, for the year ending 31st March, 1899, in the Return headed Fee Grant (Scotland), No. 224 of that year, and if he can state the amounts respectively under the same headings, and also under the heading immediately following, for the year ending 31st March, 1900.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The figures desired by the hon. Member in the order of the headings of the Return are for 1899: £161,912; £5,379 12s. 2d.; 621,405; £372,332 14s. For 1900: £149,073; £64,036 15s. 5d.; 626,341; £374,090 13s.; £321,396.

COAGH (CO. TYRONE) POSTAL SERVICE.

MR. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if his attention has been called to the fact that the existing post office service at Coagh, county Tyrone, is defective in consequence of its mails being sent viâ Moneymore instead of from Cookstown; is he aware that the change of connection to Cookstown could be made at slight cost, and, if made, that English and Dublin mails would reach Coagh seven hours and thirty-five minutes sooner than they do at present, and that replies to English letters would reach their destinations in two days instead of four; and whether, with a view to remedy the grievance, he will reconsider the memorial of the inhabitants of Coagh and district.

MR. HANBURY: The question of serving Coagh from Cookstown instead of from Moneymore, with the view of accelerating the day mail from Dublin containing the English letters, was considered last year, but it was found that the change could not be made without considerable additional expense, which the circumstances did not justify.

MR. DOOGAN: I will send the right hon. Gentleman some information on the subject.

IRISH MEDICAL OFFICERS OF HEALTH.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the provision of the new Sanitary Order of the Irish Local Government Board, by which the tenure of Irish medical officers of health has been fundamentally altered from that provided by the Act of 1878, which secured fixity of tenure save for sufficient cause; and whether he can state the authority under which the alteration has been made.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds Central): The hon. Member is under a misapprehension. The provisions of the new Sanitary Order in regard to the tenure of medical officers of health are identical, except for slight differences of wording, with those contained in the Order issued under the Public Health Act of 1878.

LICENSING CONVICTION AT CAHIRCIVEEN.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at the Cahirciveen petty sessions, which were held about the middle of June, 1900, the following magistrates attended: Messrs. J. W. Leahy, A. J. M'Dermott, R.M., and the Hon. Francis Spring Rice, and that a local licensed publican named Mary O'Neil, of Renard, was fined by those magistrates in a sum of £2, and a record on the licence; whether the offence charged against Mary O'Neil was the sale of drink after the legal closing hours; whether he is aware that the only evidence given in this case was that the licensed publican treated gratuitously the man found on the premises to a half glass of whisky; and, whether he can state what offence was committed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first and second paragraphs, except that the date of the petty sessions was the 12th May. As regards the third paragraph, the decision of the justices at petty sessions was upheld on an appeal brought by Mrs. O'Neil to the Killarney quarter sessions; evidence to the effect stated may have been given on her behalf—for that appears to be the usual defence—but evidence of a sale of drink, apparently of a more convincing character, was produced by the police against this publican, who has three times previously within the last three years been convicted of a similar offence.

MR. FLAVIN: Was the man found on licensed premises a fisherman who had slept seven miles away the night before, so that he was a bona fide traveller?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ROCKCORRY SPIRIT LICENCE CASE.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any report has been made to the constabulary or excise authorities in Ireland in relation to the case wherein the agent of Lord Dartrey's estate obtained, in his own name, a transfer of a spirit licence at Rockcorry petty sessions; has the agent, Mr. Leslie, complied with the requirements of the law by placing his name above the public-house door as licensed to sell drink for consumption on or off the premises, or is the name of his predecessor still there; and has the Government finally decided to take no action in relation to the manner in which this magistrate and land agent obtained the transfer.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The police have no duties to discharge in relation to the matters mentioned in the first paragraph. When the transfer of the licence is completed it will be the duty of the police to see that the person named in the excise licence complies with the provisions of the law referred to in the second paragraph. The answer to the last paragraph is in the affirmative. No necessity for any action on the part of the Government has, so far, arisen.

LOCOMOTIVES ON IRISH PUBLIC ROADS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can see his way to add to the Local Government (Ireland) Amendment Bill a clause to assimilate the law in Ireland to that of England in reference to the use of locomotives on public roads.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Such a clause would be out of order and could not be added to the Bill.

FISHERY REPRESENTATION ON THE IRISH AGRICULTURAL BOARD.

MR. SETON-KARR (Lancashire, St. Helens): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland, as under the provisions of the Agricultural and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act, 1899, the entire powers and duties of the Inspector of Irish Fisheries are placed under the control of the Department created by the said Act, whether the Agricultural Council and the Agricultural Board have power to advise the Department on the various subjects, including fisheries; whether the said Council and Board are now fully constituted; and will he explain why, although the Department had the power of appointing thirty-four members to the said Agricultural Council and four member to the said Agricultural Board, no representatives of the large fishery owners have been selected among the said members so appointed; and whether the Government will take any, and, if so, what steps to secure adequate representation of the large fisheries of Ireland on the Agricultural Board or other appropriate Department.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR (for Mr. PLUNKETT): The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative, but the disposal of the sum of £10,000 a year assigned for the purposes of sea fisheries in the Act is under the full control of the Department, and does not require the consent of any other body. The Council and the Board are fully constituted. In selecting persons for appointment on both bodies the Department took into consideration the various public interests involved, and did not consider it their duty to provide, as the hon. Member's question appears to suggest, for the representation of private interests. I understand that amongst the representatives appointed are persons who were chosen with reference to fishery interests.

MR. SETON-KARR: Is it not a fact that, while the fisheries are valued at £600,000, the only two members appointed to represent it are one whose fishery interest is valued at £15 a year and another interested to the extent of £20 a year, while the rest of the industry is absolutely unrepresented?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That hardly arises out of the question.

ARKLOW FISHERMEN AND DRIFT-NET FISHING.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will favourably consider the request of the fishermen of Arklow for the repeal of the laws prohibiting drift-net fishing between sunrise and sunset, as stated in their petition presented to this House.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: If a copy of the petition referred to be forwarded to the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction, the matter will be considered.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD AND IRISH COUNTY COUNCILS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if an opportunity will be given this session to discuss the action of the Local Government Board for Ireland towards the Irish county councils.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This matter has already been discussed twice, and I think it has had its proper share of Parliamentary time.

IRISH NEWSPAPERS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will take steps to secure that the local newspapers relating to the counties of Wexford and Kerry prior to the year 1835, which have accumulated in the British Museum, and are now about to be destroyed, be handed over to the county councils of these two counties respectively.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The British Museum Bill has been withdrawn, and the authorities, therefore, have no power to destroy the newspapers.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these county councils have passed resolutions asking for the return of these papers? Have the British Museum authorities acceded to their request?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Have the trustees of the British Museum any legal power to destroy documents?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No. As I understand it, the Bill asked power to transfer the custody of the papers to the local authorities; but it has been withdrawn, and they must, therefore, retain them.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: When will the Memorandum on Water-tube

Boilers be in the hands of Members? Will the Navy Vote be taken on Friday?

MR. GOSCHEN: In all probability the Navy Estimates will be taken on Friday, and I hope that the Memorandum will be issued in time before the discussion. It depends, however, on the final print of the Memorandum whether the Estimates will be taken; but I am almost sure that they will.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: We shall know, at the latest, to-morrow?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes.

MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is still in hopes of being able to proceed with the Factories and Workshops Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. I hope to make a statement on Monday, and until then my hopes are not of a defined kind.

MR. DILLON: When is it proposed to take the Third Reading of the Irish Tithes Bill? Will it be put down as the first Order of the Day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope to take it as the first Order on Thursday. Of course, it depends in part on the progress made with the Agricultural Holdings Bill.

SUNDAY CLOSING (WALES) ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee on Law, etc., with Amendments.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 267.]

Minutes of Proceedings of the Standing Committee to be printed. [No. 267.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be considered on Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 291.]

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill intituled "An Act for the regulation of the burning of human remains, and to enable burial authorities to establish crematoria." Cremation Bill [Lords].

STANDING COMMITTEE ON TRADE, ETC.—COMPANIES BILL.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I have to move the resolution standing in my name. I should like to explain that, although it has rather a formidable appearance, it is in accordance with custom, and the House will understand that even if it passes it will be entirely in the hands of the Committee to say on what days they will meet and how long they will sit. There is no intention to ask the Committee to suffer any undue strain either of time or attention; but a heavy Bill has to be dealt with, and, having regard to the late period of the session and the universal desire that this Bill or something like it should be passed, I hope that the House will assent to the motion. I may point out that so far we have only had three sittings, and each only lasted about two and a half hours. We have got through but very few clauses, and though I do not think there will be any necessity for very frequent sittings or undue debate, I do suggest it should be put in the power of the Committee to sit more frequently and longer if they so desire.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, until the conclusion of the consideration of the Companies Bill, the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., have leave to sit every day during the sitting, and notwithstanding the adjournment of the House."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): On what day will the Committee next sit?

MR. RITCHIE: It will sit on Thursday, and I want to make it possible for it to sit on Friday if it will consent to do so.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): Is this motion, which is of the kind usually made by the Chairman of the Committee, proposed with the consent of the Committee?

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.) said the right hon. Gentleman had rather suggested that members of the Committee who had taken great interest in the Bill has obstructed its progress. Now, for his part he ventured to say that they, like himself, desired to see the Bill passed in the best possible form. It must be apparent to everybody on the Committee that it contained a great many points which the right hon. Gentleman himself had not even considered until the Committee sat. He was not suggesting that the right hon. Gentleman was in any way to blame for that, for, as they knew, the Bill had come down from the House of Lords, which had taken six years to produce it. The right hon. Gentleman now suggested that more time should be given to the Bill, and that the Committee should sit oftener. They had so far only held three sittings, each of them lasting rather over two and a half hours, and he did not think it could be denied that they had made considerable progress. This motion had been made without the Committee being consulted and having an opportunity of stating whether or not they desired it. He for one strongly protested against it. Under it power was taken to sit on Saturdays, although he hoped it was not the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to do that. In order to make it quite clear, however, he would move as an Amendment to insert after "every day," "except Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays during the sitting of the House, but not later than half-past three."

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Is it in order for an individual member of a Committee without consulting that Committee to move such a resolution as this?

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Is it not the fact that a Committee appointed by this House is a foreign body sitting outside, and of the proceedings of which this House has no knowledge until it receives its Report? Is it not the case that the House can only be properly informed of the proceedings of a Committee through its chairman?

*MR. SPEAKER: The motion is one for which there are precedents. It is in order for the Government dealing with a Government Bill to put down a motion of this kind without consulting the Chairman of the Committee. It is quite true that a motion is frequently made at the very commencement of the sitting of the House, and without notice, to enable a Committee to prolong its sitting, and that I do not put it from the Chair unless it is moved by the Chairman or some Member specially designated by him. But that only applies to motions made at that time, and of which no notice has been given. But this is a motion by the Government in respect of a Government Bill. Notice was given of it, and it is in order.

MR. BRODIE HOARE (Hampstead) seconded the Amendment. He did not entirely agree with all said by the hon. Member who moved it, as he would like also to exclude Wednesdays, for the very good reason that the Public Accounts Committee, of which he was a member, met on that day, and obviously he could not be in two places at the same time. He wished, further, to add his testimony to what was said by the hon. Member for South-west Manchester, that there had been absolutely no obstruction and no long speeches. The divisions had been very close: in one the Government had been beaten, and in several cases they had only had a majority of two. The divisions had not been taken on party lines. The Bill had proved to be one of most extraordinary complication, and it required, if he might repeat a famous phrase, a "few men of common sense" to give it very careful consideration. Although ten clauses had been passed, the most contentious points had been reserved for the Report stage. If the motion of the right hon. Gentleman were carried, the only thing he could do would be to absent himself entirely from the Committee, and devote his energies to the Report stage. He had put down Amendments which he did not intend to be obstructive, but which he believed to be important, and he would move them some time, with a view to improving the administration of joint stock companies. He had given up the directorship of one of the two very important companies with which he was connected, in order to assist in passing a satisfactory Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: The form of the Amendment would be improved if it were put as follows—

"To leave out the words 'every day' in order to insert 'on Mondays and Fridays until half-past Three o'clock.'"

MR. GALLOWAY: I will accept that form.

Amendment proposed—

"After the words 'every day,' to insert the words 'on Monday and Friday until half-past Three o'clock.'"—(Mr. Galloway.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'every day' stand part of the Question."

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Member made one statement which I wish at once to contradict. I do not think he has been present at all the meetings.

MR. BRODIE HOARE: I was prevented by urgent business from attending yesterday's meeting, but I have been present at the others.

MR. RITCHIE: It was at the last meeting that the question arose of more frequent sittings. It is not accurate to say that all the important points have been reserved for the Report stage. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton if I am not correct in that. At the last meeting considerable dissatisfaction was expressed in more than one quarter at the short time the Committee had to work. It was suggested that the Committee should sit longer on that particular day, but there were some dissentients, and at last the Chairman said he would go down to the House and ask for liberty to sit. I then stated I would call further attention to the matter and move a resolution on the subject. Subsequently I consulted my hon. friend the Chairman of the Committee as to the best course to pursue, and he expressed his own readiness to come down and move the resolution now under debate. I said I did not think it was necessary that he should do so. It has now been moved in the usual form. I need hardly say I shall not ask the Committee to consent to meet on Saturdays, nor will it be invited to meet at any day or hour which would be inconvenient to the great bulk of the members. But it might sometimes sit till four or five o'clock, and perhaps meet on one or two extra days, so that it may get through its work, and report the Bill to the House in time to enable it to consider the various important questions involved. It is most desirable that we should make a strong endeavour to pass this Bill, which has been before Parliament four or five years.

SIR ALFRED HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.): May I point out that this motion is purely a permissive one, and when it is passed it will still be in the hands of the Committee to decide when and how long it shall sit. I should be extremely sorry to see the labour spent on this Bill thrown away for the sake of having one or two additional meetings of the Committee.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.): As a member of the Committee who has taken some little interest in the Bill, I venture to express a hope that the motion of the right. hon. Gentleman will be accepted. Some members of the Committee have, at considerable personal inconvenience, made a point of attending the meetings, and it has been not a little disappointing to find what an extremely small amount of time has been at our disposal. When only one or two matters have been discussed the hands of the clock have approached three, and the time has arrived for adjourning. If the motion is carried, the Committee will still be able to arrange its own meetings and consult its own convenience.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Do I understand that the Amendment as now worded will exclude Wednesdays?

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: It is very important that members of the Public Accounts Committee should be present at the meetings of that body, and therefore I hope the House will agree to the exclusion of Wednesdays. I cannot comprehend the right hon. Gentleman coming down here otherwise than as the mouthpiece of the Committee; unless he is so his action strikes at the very root of the constitutional power of the Committee. If you are to say that a Committee is to be in the hands of any Member of the Government, and that any proposition, however wild, novel, or unexpected, may be brought forward by him simply because he happens to sit upon the Committee, you strike at the root of the authority and power of that Committee. It seems to be clear that in this instance the Committee has not been consulted. If it had been, then I conceive it was the duty of the Chairman, and not of an incidental member of the Government who happens to be on it, to act as its mouthpiece here. It behoves the House to deal very carefully with this matter. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider his motion. I think he has done this thing without reflection, and here is an opportunity for the right hon. Gentleman to make a graceful concession and to state that he will accept the Amendment.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I feel it my duty to express my concurrence with what has fallen from the Members for West Wolverhampton and South Leeds, and I would also endorse what was said by the hon. Member for Hampstead that there is great need on the Committee for men of common sense. I would ask the House to deal with this matter in a common-sense way and not wander into any of the constitutional by-paths suggested by the hon. Member for King's Lynn. The hon. Member said that there was only one member of Her Majesty's Government upon that Committee; but I would remind him that upon that Committee there will be found the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, and the Secretary to the Local Government Board. I think that is a very fair complement of Government representatives. This motion is really to enable the Committee to do what it likes. Under the rules of the House the moment the bell is heard tingling, whatever the Committee are doing, they have to stop. A Committee which assembles at twelve o'clock to rise at three, with an adjournment for half an hour for lunch, has not much time for business. The Committee come to the House and ask to be emancipated from this position, leaving the matter entirely in the hands of the Committee. My experience of the right hon. Gentleman opposite and the Chairman of the Committee makes me absolutely certain that no measure will be passed by the Committee to interfere with the convenience of Members, or with Wednesdays or Saturdays. What we want to be able to do is to meet at eleven if we choose, or go on till five, in order to get through the work which the House has given us to do. I wish to ask another question, and it is whether this Bill is to be passed or not? A large number of hon. Members would have liked to have seen the Companies Bill made somewhat stronger; but, speaking with some knowledge of rejecting a Bill one session in the hope of a stronger measure being brought forward in the next session, I think a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, and this is a very good Bill as far as it goes. Hon. Members will have an opportunity of considering the measure when it comes down from the Committee. In the meantime the Committee stage must be got through, and it cannot be got through in the limited time which is placed at the disposal of the Committee this session. I think it would be a very great pity and would strike a very serious blow at these Committees if, after a large number of Members had devoted their time and attention to endeavouring to pass a Bill, that Bill should be thrown over at the end of the session and all their labour wasted. I shall support the motion of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): At the risk of wandering into one of those constitutional by-paths alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, I would like to call attention to the ordinary method of procedure. The right hon. Gentleman wants every Standing Committee to be the custodian of its own movements, to sit when it likes and where it likes. I must remind hon. Members that the House has always itself laid down a general rule upon this question which it has only varied under special circumstances. The service of the House, after you, Mr. Speaker, have taken the Chair, has always had precedence over all other business, and I do protest against the doctrine being laid down that the service of the Honse itself is to be put aside, and that hon. Members are to be called upon to perform dual services upstairs and down at the same time. The way to get over the difficulty is that the Committee should sit at a reasonable hour which suits the convenience of the Members, but they should not be permitted by the House to sit after 3.30. I think that to sit after that time would be running counter to all precedent, and it is not merely red tape, but it simply means that the service of the House itself stands forward as our first consideration. I venture to suggest that 3.30 of the clock should be the limit.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): As a humble member of the Standing Committee I wish to point out that the question is not so much whether the Bill is to pass or not, as was asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton, but whether the Bill is to be passed with or without adequate discussion. It is impossible for this Bill to be passed with adequate discussion if you call the Committee together to discuss the Bill when the busiest members of it are engaged elsewhere. They will not attend then, and the measure will be discussed in a very perfunctory manner. What is the meaning of all this hurry? I never saw the motion of the right hon. Gentleman until I came down to the House today, and nobody ever suspected that such a motion was going to be made. One might assume from this hurry that the existence of the Government was at stake, and that the Government would inflict upon the country the calamity of going out of office if the Bill were not passed. It is a most contentious and difficult Bill, and it is impossible not to admire the ingenuity and skill with which the Committee have discussed every line and word of the clauses of the Bill already dealt with. I think the House should have an almost perfect Bill brought before it. It is really of little importance whether the Bill is passed this year or next year, for it does not virtually affect the business of the country. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has shown the slightest reason for the extraordinary course which he has taken.

*Mr. MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As a member of this Committee, I wish to say that I share the expression of regret made by my hon. friend that this matter was not mentioned when the Committee was sitting because if it had been so mentioned an opportunity would have been given of making a suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill which I may be permitted to make now, and which would tend to save time. It is that he should confer with those members of the Committee who put down acceptable Amendments on the Paper with a view to reducing the amount of discussion that goes on in connection with them. During the past three sittings we have been discussing Amendment after Amendment and voting them down, and after they have been discussed and rejected the right hon. Gentleman has more than once accepted some Amendment which has stood on the Paper the whole time. If those Amendments had been accepted in the first instance, all the discussion which preceded them would have been rendered unnecessary. There is a strong disposition to put the Bill forward as rapidly as possible, but if quick progress is to be made, useless discussion must be avoided, and the acceptance of reasonable Amendments, to which no real objection exists, should be promptly notified.

Mr. Maclean.

*Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): As Chairman of the Committee I desire to say a word or two to remove any misapprehension that may exist as to my own position in this matter. The fact is that at several sittings of the Committee there has been a desire manifested to make progress with the Bill if necessary during the time when the House is sitting. This was especially so at the last meeting, at the conclusion of which I signified to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that I was perfectly willing to move in the House for leave for the Committee to sit during the sittings of the House. The right hon. Gentleman kindly expressed his readiness to make such a motion himself, and that is the motion which I anticipated would be on the Paper. When I saw the actual terms of the motion this morning for the first time, I was very much surprised. The right hon. Gentleman has informed me, since I entered the House this afternoon, that he was informed at the Table that this was the usual motion made upon occasions of this kind; and under those circumstances I presume that I should myself have had to make a motion in the same terms. It appears to me, however, that those terms are a great deal too wide. I could not comply with them myself. I am bound, for instance, to be on Wednesdays in the Chair in the Public Accounts Committee, and it would be impossible for me to be in the Chair of the Standing Committee on that day. The difficulty might, perhaps, be got over by means of an Emergency Chairman, under the arrangements which members of the Chairman's Panel make among themselves; but that is not desirable. It appears to me that a motion asking for leave to sit while the House is sitting is all that is necessary. The Committee already have the power to meet at eleven or twelve o'clock. It also has power to meet on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, or Friday, and last week the Committee did sit on Tuesday instead of the usual Monday, and the same divergence from the usual practice could be exercised by the Committee at its discretion. I think, therefore, that a motion for leave to sit while the House is sitting would meet all the requirements of the case. The reason I rose to explain was lest some hon. Members of the Committee should think that I was in any way wanting in my duty to the Committee, or in the respect which is due to it.

MR. RITCHIE: After what has fallen from the hon. Member who is the Chairman of the Committee, I am quite prepared to ask the leave of the House to amend the motion in the direction indicated. I understood that a motion would be made leaving it entirely in the hands of the Committee, to adopt whatever course they chose. I am quite prepared to move my motion in the form suggested.

*MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. Member wishes to withdraw his Amendment, and that the motion should be amended by leaving out all the words after "sit" in order to insert "during the sitting of the House."

MR. ELLIOT (Durham): Are we to understand that the Committee will have power to sit on Mondays, Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays if they choose? I think it is well that the matter should be made plain.

MR. RITCHIE: We are now merely giving a kind of instruction to the Committee that they should consider the propriety of sitting on other days beyond what is usual.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): I desire on behalf of a great number of Members to state how much we appreciate the efforts of the President of the Board of Trade to push this matter forward. It is a common-sense arrangement, especially in view of the fact that we are getting to the end of the session.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I should like to ask if the President of the Board of Trade has had the approval of the Chairman of the Committee in the motion he has made, because I read in the report of the last meeting of the Committee that, with reference to the suggestion that the Committee should sit longer and more frequently—

"Mr. Ritchie expressed himself as very willing, and even anxious, that this should be done, but, on the Chairman's proposing to ask leave of the House for the Committee to sit till a later hour, the proposition met with strong indications of dissent. The Chairman said that, in view of the pronounced opposition, the thing could not be done."

I think it is a pity that the Chairman of the Committee is not here to explain.

MR. RITCHIE: The hon. Gentleman will be surprised to learn that the Chairman is here and has spoken in this discussion. He stated that he and I had arranged that a motion should be made, though not the particular motion on the Paper.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

"To leave out from the word 'sit,' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'during the sitting of the House.'"—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I am quite sure this discussion would not have arisen to-day if we had known of the intention of the right hon. Gentleman in the Committee.

Question put, and negatived.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That, until the conclusion of the Consideration of the Companies Bill, the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., have leave to sit during the Sitting of the House.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), further considered.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): The clause I have to move is to provide for compensation to a tenant who is compelled to vacate his holding under circumstances that cannot be described as his own fault. My object is that we should take an important step in what should be the direction of this type of legislation—namely, to give more encouragement and a greater degree of security to farmers who have improved their land and discharged their duties to the landowners, and to discourage farmers who have not carried out that policy and who have deteriorated the land. The clause which I have placed on the Paper has been before the House on previous occasions. It was considered very fully by the Welsh

Land Commission, and I should like to remind hon. Members who have read the Reports of that Commission that both the Majority and Minority Reports express their assent in explicit terms to the precise wording of this clause. I wish to draw attention to that fact because I desire to give as much authority as I can to the form of the proposal. The object of the clause is to deal with certain cases which can be easily enumerated. In the first place we have capricious evictions by landowners. The most familiar cases arise with regard to the use by the tenant of the legislative rights which have been given him under the Ground Game Act. I have a number of cases where farmers have received notice to quit because they have exercised these rights, and the object of the clause is to provide that where a tenant farmer is capriciously evicted the same principle of compensation shall be applied as is applied where a person is deprived of a valuable interest in any other form of real estate. What the clause asserts is that where a tenant is dispossessed of his holding without sufficient reason he shall have an allowance which would cover the loss of his trade connection, goodwill, and other losses of that kind. In addition to these cases of capricious eviction the House will remember that the Welsh Land Commission especially drew attention to the hardship inflicted on tenants on estates where the ownership passed by sale, inheritance, or bankruptcy. Very great hardship occurs under the existing law, because the tenants have to decide practically at once whether they will accept a higher scale of rents and retain their holding, or whether they will submit to a very considerable loss. I should like to quote the evidence of one very able witness before the Agricultural Commission, who, I believe, is a strong supporter of the Government in Northumberland. I refer to Mr. Wilkinson. He said that the tenant has insufficient security and was often compelled to accept an unjust and unreasonable rent rather than leave the farm and suffer loss. He states—

> "I think the tenant should be protected from an arbitrary notice to quit by being allowed compensation for disturbance. We want to be able to deal with our landlords on equal terms, and not for them to be able to say 'Sign that agreement or quit the farm.' We are tired of that sort of thing in the North, and we say that we are entitled to compensation for loss sustained in that way."

Mr. Channing.

The whole clause turns on the fact that the man who puts most into the land is the man who is least protected under the existing law, and the greater a tenant's stake is in the improvements he has carried out the weaker is his position with regard to the whole question of bargaining as to rent. I will not in the least disguise that the main object of the clause is to put the tenant farmer into a position of greater strength in order that he may be able to bargain, with a reasonable chance of success, for a fair rent. This, of course, may be met with the familiar retort that the tenant farmers have been masters of the situation, and have dictated the rents of all the farms in England during the last ten or fifteen years. I absolutely traverse that contention. It is true only of derelict, broken-down, and worthless farms, which go begging in the market, and for which a tenant farmer or anybody else can make any terms they please. But in regard to highly cultivated farms to which men had devoted their capital and energy for years, making the land the bank in which they invested the savings of their lives, the tenants are in a position of great weakness, and they have not been able to transfer the economic loss of the depression from themselves to the landlord. One of the sub-commissioners of the Royal Commission, Mr. Wilson Fox, who cannot be accused of a lack of friendliness to landlords, and was also a man of great ability and fairness of mind, gave us figures of large farms of various types, most of them of high quality, in the county of Lincoln. Those figures showed that the rents of eleven of these farms during the period of depression were between forty and fifty times the net profit obtained by the farmers. I allude to that in order to show that during the period of depression farmers, so far from being able to obtain a reasonable reduction of rent, which would put them in the position of having, as the Income Tax assessment assumes, a profit of half or even a third of the rent, had their profit reduced to a fifth, a seventh, and even a thirtieth or a fiftieth part of the rent. I therefore say that there is no force in the contention that the farmers have been able to dictate their own terms. On the ground of strengthening their position and of enabling them to deal fairly with rent I beg to move this clause, which goes to this effect, that where the farmer is dispossessed, not through his own fault—I do not wish to protect any farmer who behaves wrongly either as regards rent or covenants—we should have applied the same principle as to allowance, or compensation, which is observed in dispossessing every other class of persons in the land, or in our social arrangements. He is to be compensated for loss of trade interest, business connection, and all the rest of the loss caused by removal.

New clause—

"Where a tenant is compelled to quit his holding by the act of his landlord for any cause other than the following (that is to say):—

(1) That he has not paid the rent due to his landlord within any period agreed by the contract of tenancy or otherwise; or

(2) That he has persisted in committing or permitting waste, to the prejudice of his landlord, by the dilapidation of buildings or fences, or by the deterioration of the soil, after notice from the landlord not to commit, or permit, or to desist from the particular waste specified in such notice;

the tenant shall be entitled on quitting his holding to obtain from the landlord, in addition to the compensation, if any, due to him under the Act, further compensation in respect of the loss sustained by reason of quitting his holding, and any question under this section, if in dispute, and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by arbitration under this Act, and such compensation shall be separately specified in the award, and shall be recoverable under the provisions of this Act."—(Mr. Channing.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): I hope the House will not read this clause a second time. The hon. Member has told the House that the principle of compensation for disturbance was recommended by the Welsh Land Commission, but he has not told the House that this question was most carefully inquired into by the Royal Commission on which he himself sat, and in the Report issued by that Royal Commission it was stated that while some witnesses had argued in favour of that proposition the whole question had been carefully investigated, and that the Royal Commission were distinctly opposed to the principles of the proposal. Apart from the finding of that Commission, I may say that if ever there was a time when a proposal of that kind could be justified, that time no longer exists. It is possible that in the days of very great agricultural prosperity, and when, no doubt, the opportunities of the tenant for guarding his own interests or for selecting his own position were not so good as now, there were cases of hardship. But I believe that there have been fewer cases of injustice and hardship to a farmer who expends his capital in improvements, than in the history of any other negotiation in the country. It is said that the tenant farmer is capriciously evicted. No doubt there have been such cases and they may arise again; but everybody knows that at the present day the great object of the owner of land is to encourage the tenant farmer to remain in occupation of his holding, and to farm it on the best terms. I do not believe, therefore, that there is any justification for a proposal of this kind. In the first place, as the Bill stands a principle is laid down which can easily be acted upon both by the landlord and the tenant, and which gives to the tenant a right to secure payment for that which he leaves on the land, the benefit of which will be reaped by somebody else. The Bill provides the machinery for that. But if you open up the question of compensation suggested by the hon. Gentleman you will render the task of the arbitrators one of immense difficulty, and present a certain vista of litigation between the landlord and the tenant. It would introduce a principle which would be vexatious to the landlord, of no good to the tenant, and it is one which would deter landlords from entering into arrangements with their tenants which might be beneficial to both. On all grounds, therefore, I hope the House will not accept a proposal of this kind. I quite understand the motive of the hon. Gentleman. He believes that legislation ought to interfere more than at present with the position of landlord and tenant. Some people believe that the relations between landlord and tenant will never be satisfactory until the whole question of rent is decided by some public tribunal, and not, as now, by private arrangement between owner and occupier. The Government, who are responsible for this Bill, have no sympathy with views of that kind. They believe, on the contrary, that the adoption of such views would be prejudicial to the interests of tenants, and result in the absolute ruin of the agricultural interest as a whole. We are told that poor tenant farmers cannot make bargains which would protect their own interests. I have lived among tenant farmers all my life, and have come in contact with them in all parts of the United Kingdom, and I am inclined to believe that the statement of the incapacity of the farmer to look after his own interests would not be made so readily at an agricultural gathering. The farmers themselves would be the first to show that they were well able to manage their own affairs, and to resent the imputation that they are either very weak or very foolish. I believe that farmers are not likely to be capriciously evicted unless they adopt the principles of the Irish Land Acts about fixity of tenure, free sale, and compensation for disturbance, with all their mischievousness. The only safe policy for the House to adopt is to adhere to the principles embodied in the Bill.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthenshire, W.): When I saw this new clause on the Order Paper I did not entertain any very sanguine hopes that the right hon. Gentleman would accept it; but I cannot help expressing my regret that he has not been able to do so. He has told the House that this clause was not recommended by the Royal Commission on Agriculture. In that the right hon. Gentleman is quite correct; but I think that he is incorrect when he goes on to say that the farming class do not desire to have the proposal contained in this clause. When this Bill becomes an Act of Parliament, there is nothing, I am sure, which will give the tenant farmers of the country more widespread disappointment than the absence of a clause of this kind. I quite appreciate that in several instances agricultural associations in different parts of the country have passed resolutions expressing satisfaction with the proposals of the Government as embodied in this Bill. But I repeat that when the great body of farmers get face to face with the actual accomplishment of the Government, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that they will be very much disappointed. The expectations held out to them during the course of the last general election were of a very different kind from those embodied in this Bill. I do not think any hon. Gentleman will venture to dispute that. My hon. friend in moving the new clause told the House that a proposal of this kind was very much required in Wales. The recommendations of the Welsh Land Commission, which did not seem to me to be received by the right hon. the President of the Board of Agriculture with the respect which they deserve, contained a proposal that tenants should receive compensation for capricious eviction from their holdings. That was a recommendation not of a mere majority of the members of the Commission, but was arrived at unanimously. Mr. Sebohm, Lord Kenyon, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Swansea, were all agreed that, on the evidence put before the Commission, an unanswerable case had been made out for compensation for capricious eviction. On behalf of my constituents, therefore, I think this clause should be adopted. The President of the Board of Agriculture has told us that this proposal is not required by the farmers of England at all. It may be that that is true. I do not pretend to have a complete knowledge of the farmers of England, but I am entitled to speak with some knowledge of the farmers in my own part of the country, among whom I have lived all my life, and I maintain that nothing is more urgently required by them than that they should have compensation for capricious eviction. There is no suggestion in this clause that a farmer who left his holding on his own account would have any compensation except that which is given by the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883. All that is proposed is that if the farmer is compulsory evicted he shall be compensated. It is only fair and right that when a man is turned out of his holding at the mere caprice of his landlord, not because he is a bad farmer, not because he is letting his land deteriorate, not because he has allowed his buildings to become dilapidated, but because he has had some petty quarrel with his landlord about the county council election or something that has taken place in the parish, he should receive compensation. The right hon. Gentleman says that such a state of things as that does not arise in England. That may or may not be, although I do not agree with him, because it does arise in Wales—I do not think these cases arise so frequently as they used, but they undoubtedly do arise—and when a man is turned out of his holding in that way he should have some compensation for the trouble and expense to which he is put, for which this Bill gives no compensation. This is a small Bill, which does not introduce any new feature into the agricultural law, and deals rather with the machinery of the law than with anything else. But if this clause, and it is not a revolutionary clause by any means, be accepted, it will to some extent give the tenant farmer some security of tenure. He would occupy a position of greater stability if his landlord knew that if he gave him notice in a fit of caprice he would have to pay for it. It is not the better class of landlord who gives his tenant notice in a fit of caprice. If this amendment is accepted it will operate to some extent in favour of security of tenure, because if the landlord knew that, if he gave his tenant notice to quit for an insufficient reason, a tenant who had farmed well and carried out all the terms of his agreement, but who had displeased his landlord—if the landlord knew that if he gave that man notice to quit for an insufficient reason he would have to pay, over and above that which the law allows, some compensation for disturbance, it would prevent him from taking such a step. I daresay in some parts of England such legislation is quite unnecessary; but I am speaking for a class of people for whom it is necessary, and the Welsh Land Commission has reported in favour of such legislation. Under these circumstances, if my hon. friend goes to a division, I shall be happy to support him.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) said, so long as the hon. Member for West Carmarthenshire confined his remarks to the Welsh aspect of this question, it was beyond his right to criticise them. He had not looked at the Celtic side of the matter. From the position taken up by the hon. Gentleman one would imagine that a person had a right to hire another person's land, and that then, in defiance of the owner, he could claim compensation on receiving notice to quit. That was a principle which, so far as he was aware, had never been laid down by any Commission which had ever sat. The representative agricultural bodies of the country had wisely declined to lend themselves to any such revolutionary doctrine. There might be here and there a farmers' club which advocated it, but the great representative agricultural bodies of the country did not. The House would do well to reject the Amendment, and support the proposition that a man has a right to let his farm to anyone he thinks fit, in accordance with the law, and to terminate the tenancy when he thinks fit, in accordance also with the law.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I will not detain the House more than a few moments, but I should like to point out that the Bill, so far as Wales is concerned, does not go to the root of the evil, and on another occasion it will be the duty of the Welsh Members to lay their views before the House in a different form. With regard to the Bill now before us, I should not like the discussion on this clause to terminate without cordially supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire. With regard to the remarks of the right hon. Member for Thanet, who admitted that he had never dived into the Celtic fringe in this matter, if that be so, we cordially forgive him for the remarks he has made. This sub-clause is the result of recommendations made, after exhaustive inquiries, by the Welsh Land Commission, and the feeling of the country is very strong upon it. I live in a country where the land question looms large, and I have no hesitation in saying that if this clause were passed it would meet with a very large force of public approval, and be the means of amending this Bill, so far as Wales is concerned, in a very substantial manner.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) said he was scarcely prepared to give the clause his support if it went to a division, but as a Scotch Member he felt that there were circumstances under which a clause of this description would be to the interest of the tenants. He quite agreed that cases of the kind mentioned by the hon. Member opposite were not so common now as formerly, though there could be no doubt that they did arise even now. The right hon. Member for Thanet seemed to claim a right for the landlords to let land at their pleasure, and then to evict tenants as they pleased, and that this was a Bill to interfere with that which the landlords have a right to do. This clause did not interfere on behalf of the tenant farmer, but in the interests of the nation at large. The Bill provided compensation for improvements; but the Committee ought to go further if agriculture was to be a prosperous occupation They ought to give to the tenant security of tenure, and if the farmer invested his money on other people's land he ought to know that he was secure from the curious freaks of temper of the landlord, and therefore some equitable arrangement of this kind ought to be made. He supported the broad principle, but was afraid he could not support the Amendment to the extent of voting for it on a division.

*Mr. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I support the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire. If the clause is passed it will be regarded by Welsh farmers as an extremely valuable addition to the Bill. Formerly, when a rich man purchased an estate, he bought not only the land and the buildings upon the land, but in addition to that he bought the consciences—the political consciences, at all events—of the tenants of the soil. We have in the past seen a great deal too much oppression both in religious and political life in consequence of the enormous powers which the landlord possessed, and which, directly or indirectly, he could exercise. That power has seldom been exercised directly, but for every single eviction that has taken place hundreds of people have been terrorised. I am glad to bear my testimony that that state of things has very largely improved in England and Wales in recent years. I should be sorry to say that anything of the kind I have described has been of a general character. What we ask is that the tenants should be placed beyond the reach of fear in this respect, and that a man's politics and religion should have absolutely nothing to do with the tenure or cultivation of the land. If this clause were passed I believe the effect would be that the tenant would feel himself to be what I am sure every hon. Member in this House (except, perhaps, the hon. Member for Thanet) would wish him to be—a really independent man, owning no allegiance to the owner of the soil in regard to religion or politics because of the relationship between them as landlord and tenant. Have I not laid down a fair proposition? Is there any Member of the House who would venture to dispute that? What my hon. friend proposes to do by the clause is to assure to the tenant a position that would put him outside the reach of fear. I hope the Government may see their way to accept this clause, believing that, in Wales at all events, it would be accepted by the tenants as giving them protection to which they are entitled.

Lord HUGH CECIL (Greenwich) said he had to express his pleasure that the Government had been unable to accept the clause, which involved a principle going far beyond the limits of the Bill, and illustrated very well the point at which it was necessary to draw the line. The Amendment introduced the principle of divided ownership. No such principle was recognised in the Bill, at all events he hoped it was not recognised. The principle of the Bill, as he understood it, was that where a tenant added to the value of the landlord's property he should be compensated for that, but the principle of the Amendment was that the tenant should acquire a right in the property, and that he was to come into possession of the landlord's right. It was clear that if they once admitted that principle they would adopt the whole Irish land system. The moment the tenant got in as a partner in the ownership of a farm, then he had a right to sell that farm. The Government would have to come down and settle the relationship between them as regards fair rents, and every detail in the management which was characteristic of the Irish land system. [An Hon. Member: Why not?] He would give an illustration. It had been said that the landlord might use his power vexatiously. Almost all rights of property of any kind whatever might be used vexatiously. The hon. Member for the Flint Boroughs had spoken of intimidation in religious matters, but the same thing might occur in other avocations. A banker or solicitor who had lent money to various small shopkeepers might exercise an improper influence over his debtors. They could not prevent people who had not a free choice from being subject to the influence of others. The essence of freedom was to have a free choice. It should be recognised that this Amendment proceeded wholly on a different principle from that embodied in the Bill. He hoped that they would be careful to maintain on this occasion the great impropriety of divided ownership. The true remedy for the grievance was a healthy public opinion. In England intimidation would never be tolerated. They would resent it vigorously, and if English landlords endeavoured to coerce their tenantry, they would speedily find that to be so.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire) said he could not conceive how anybody who understood the agricultural position of the country could have drafted such a clause as this. It was altogether on the wrong lines, as any man of common sense would see. He thought it would be unfair to interfere too much between landlord and tenant. What would be the end of it? The tenant would, no doubt, put before the arbitrator every single point in a long term of tenancy, and all that would lead to lawyers' bills; and if there was one thing that a farmer disliked extremely it was to pay such bills. The tenant would have enormous bills to pay if this clause was carried out, and he would be continually arbitrating with the landlord. He knew very few landlords who would care to put out a tenant who had met his obligations justly and reasonably. If a landlord got his fair share, or what he had invested in the land, they might depend upon it that he would take a lenient view of the whole case, and be willing to judge what should be done with regard to compensation. If this clause was carried they would have no end of litigation and no peace. They would have the Irish land question in England and Scotland. He hoped the House would by a very large majority defeat the Amendment.

MR. JASPER MORE (Shropshire Ludlow) said it was all very well to speak of cases of capricious eviction, but he believed such cases hardly ever occurred.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

*MR. GORDON: (Elgin and Nairn): In moving the new clause which stands under my name I desire very shortly to explain to the House the purposes this clause has in view. Among the agricultural tenants of Scotland by far the largest proportion are men whose buildings have been erected by the capitalists who own the property, the tenants themselves having no interest in and making no claim for the buildings. There are a second class, well known to this House, namely, crofters, in the Highland districts of Scotland, whose interests in their holdings have been regulated by the Crofters Acts. What I want to bring to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill and of the House is that there is a third class, not a very numerous class in Scotland as a whole, though somewhat numerous in my own constituency. This class stand in a different relation, and under this Bill I cannot see that they will receive any protection whatever. The Government, no doubt desire to cover every agriculturalist, whether he is large or small in his occupation; whether protected by legal documents or trusting to the feudal estates and the customs of those estates, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to look with favour upon such a clause as this. I would not seek his approval of the words if I could secure his approval of the principle, so that this class of men who are crofters, but not in the crofting districts, should, in case of removal, have the power of coming into the benefits of this measure, and at least have the opportunity of proving before the tribunal created under this Bill whether or not the improvements on their farms are of their own creation; so that, as I believe they have in morals, they may also have in law, a protection for their property in these matters. In my own constituency cases arise rather under estate management. Many of the estates erect buildings from A to Z, but there are other estates where the buildings are left to the creation of the crofter himself, and very often they have been erected by previous generations. Whilst I would pay every tribute of regard to the management of these large estates and the sanctity of contract maintained between proprietor and crofter, in nearly every case the danger becomes almost alarming when these old estates pass into the hands of new men, or under the management of lawyers, who take a sharper, harsher, and more strictly legal point of view. All I ask is that this Bill shall not pass through the House without allowing these men, who are undoubtedly the creators of their own improvements, and whose position is now respected on the estates where they live, should not suffer the danger in strange hands of being unprotected by the law while the law is in process of amendment. No claim is made by the man on whose behalf I am now speaking for any compensation for anything created by the capital of the proprietor. All he asks is that property of his own creation, whether it is in the reclamation of land or in the building of houses, should become matter for investigation before the tribunal created by this Bill. It is easy to see that in an old-fashioned arrangement, such as the one I have described, there might be claims put forward by the landlord which would to some extent nullify the claims of the tenant for his improvements. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

New clause—

"That in the case of crofters or cottars in Scotland, as defined in the Crofters (Scotland) Holdings Acts, 1886, 1887, and 1888 (whose holdings are situated in parishes or counties to which these Acts do not apply), such improvements as are set forth in Part 1 of the First Schedule of the Act, which may have been executed or paid for by the crofter or his predecessor in the same family whilst under no written obligation to the landlord to make them, and prior to the passing of this Act, and which will add to the letting value of the holding, shall be compensated for on his leaving the holding, under the procedure provided in this Act, but for such improvements executed after the passing of this Act consent of the landlord will be required."—(Mr. Gordon.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

*MR. LONG: I hope my hon. friend will not press this clause, because it seems to be moved under a misapprehension. The object he seeks is to include within the benefits of this Bill those crofters or cottars in Scotland who do not come under the Crofters Act, which is limited to particular counties, to which benefits have been given on account of particular circumstances. My hon. friend suggests in the case of these crofters that they shall be treated as if they had obtained consent, and that only in future shall they require to obtain consent. I am not in the position to speak of tenants in a similar position to crofters, though they are not under the Crofters Act. It may be true that there are individual cases of hardship, but it would be impossible to apply this measure to a limited portion of the kingdom. Not only this, but it would be extremely unfair to attempt to do anything of the kind. I submit that the proper course for my hon. friend to take is not to seek to graft on to this Bill a proposal dealing with these people, but endeavour to bring the crofters for whom he pleads under the Crofters' Holdings Acts.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): The right hon. Gentleman has, I am sorry to say, given but small encouragement to my hon. friend in regard to the clause he has laid before the House. The two main arguments of the right hon. Gentleman have been (1) that my hon. friend's clause merely dealt with a few individual cases in Scotland—with regard to which argument I shall have a word or two to say in a moment; and (2) he contended that the Government could not be expected to deal with cases of special hardship. If any Government come before this House and lay on the Table a Bill which is to alter the condition of agricultural tenancies, they ought to endeavour to meet all special cases of hardship as well as all general cases. This Bill, as it stands, endeavours to meet a hardship analogous to that of the crofters in the case of the market gardeners, who are provided for in the schedule.

*MR. LONG: That is not so, and I do not profess in this Bill to legislate in any way whatever for market gardeners.

MR. BUCHANAN: All I contend is that the special case of market gardeners is recognised, and I make a similar claim on behalf of these small tenants. I was somewhat astonished at the last statement of the right hon. Gentleman when he told the hon. Member opposite to try and get these tenants included in the Crofters Act. Does he mean that statement to be taken literally?

*MR. LONG: I guarded my remarks by saying that I had no personal knowledge as to whether those crofters had a claim for legislation, and I submitted that it would not be proper in this Bill to propose crofter legislation.

Mr. Long.

MR. BUCHANAN: The right hon. Gentleman suggested that we should try and get the Crofters Act extended to these particular tenants. The President of the Board of Agriculture should not hold out that as an inducement to the hon. Member not to press forward his Amendment, unless he is prepared to assist him in obtaining the remedy he seeks. But is this really a small grievance to which my hon. friend has called attention? Why does the right hon. Gentleman bring forward a Bill which includes Scotland, where the conditions are different to those prevailing in England, when he himself admits that he is unaware of the condition of the tenants in Scotland? What is the condition of affairs in the north-east of Scotland? Here is a Return which is ten years old, which shows that in Morayshire there were 1,762 farms, and of these 1,107 were under £30 annual value, £35 being the limit allowed by the Crofters Act. Under this Act these tenants would have a substantial grievance to all intents and purposes. They have made all the improvements in those farms, but they will receive no compensation under this Bill. In another county, out of 3,000 farms, no less than 2,114 are under £35 annual value. In Aberdeenshire the proportion is not quite so large, but out of 11,300 holdings no less than 6,053 are crofts under £30 annual value, and upon the vast majority of these crofts the tenants have made all the improvements. They have brought the land into cultivation, erected fences, and built dwellings upon them without obtaining the written consent of the landlord to construct them. What is the condition of things under the Bill? The measure provides that no tenant shall obtain compensation for building substantial improvements unless he has obtained the consent of his landlord to the making those improvements. That proviso absolutely shuts out two-thirds of the tenants in the north-east of Scotland from any possible benefit under the Bill. I think that is a very glaring omission in a Bill which purports to provide a remedy for the tenants of Scotland as well as for the tenants of England. I say that this particular class of tenant has a prerogative claim upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government in dealing with this subject. Five years ago, in the year

1895, when a Liberal Government was in office, they brought forward a Bill in which it was proposed, amongst other things, to extend the benefits of the Crofters Act to crofters in the north-eastern counties of Scotland. That measure was opposed by the present First Lord of the Treasury from the Front Opposition Bench, and when we urged that what was particularly wanted was an easy and cheap method of giving tenants compensation for improvements, what was the answer given by the then Leader of the Opposition? In reply to our argument as to why the Crofters Act should be extended, the present First Lord of the Treasury said on the 11th of June, 1895—*

"In my opinion small tenants have an absolute right to be protected, but they have no greater right than the big tenants, and therefore the right ought not to be confined to one or two counties in the north-east of Scotland. I should like to see that protection extended in a safe and fair form to all counties, in all cases in which expenditure by the tenant has taken the form of a legitimate improvement of the holding of which he is the occupier."

That was a substantial promise that when the Government of which he was a Member came to legislate upon this subject he would endeavour to deal when legislating with all the three countries and with all the cases in them. In excluding these tenants from the possibility of claiming compensation for the substantial improvements they have effected on their farms, the Government are failing to carry out the policy which they held out to the people of Scotland, and they have presented to this House a very imperfect and inadequate measure.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham) said it did not follow that because a tenant was paying under £30 a year that he was a crofter. Most of the tenants in the north-east of Scotland, to whom the hon. Member had referred, were not crofters, but small farmers, and most of the buildings on their land were built not by the tenants, but by the landlords. Upon farms of £30 rental the walls were built by the landlord and the drainage was generally carried out by the landlord. Therefore he could not imagine anything more detrimental to small farmers in Aberdeenshire and Morayshire than to bring them under the Crofters Act when they were not crofters at all. Such a proposal would prevent any farm servant from taking a small farm on his own account. The great ambition of farm servants was to save up sufficient money to take a small farm and be independent. If the suggestion made by the Member for East Aberdeenshire was adopted, not only would everything which the landlord had erected on these farms be confiscated and handed over to the tenant, but it would prevent any industrious farm servant from the possibility of getting a small farm. Not only this, but it would act as an inducement to the landlord not to carry out any improvements upon these small farms. It would also be ruinous to the farmers themselves. It was true that there were a large number of tenants who had improved their farms and had erected the whole of their farm buildings, but in such a case when the farmer gave up his farm the incoming tenant had to pay for all those buildings.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) thought that the speech of the President of the Board of Agriculture was undoubtedly the best defence they could have of the action they took upon the Second Reading of this measure, in regard to having separate Bills for England and Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman had told them, with a simplicity that was remarkable, that he had had no experience in regard to the tenants of Scotland, but still, he might have consulted the Lord Advocate. He hoped that his hon. friend would press his Amendment to a division. The right hon. Gentleman had told him that he must not graft this legislation on the Bill before the House, but that he must take some future opportunity of bringing in special legislation on this question. Therefore the right hon. Gentleman had given them encouragement to bring forward a Bill in the future for extending the Crofters Act, and perhaps he would throw in his influence to get the Government to back up the First Lord of the Treasury in those strenuous endeavours which he had several times promised to make on behalf of this meritorious class of people. He was bound to say that he thought his hon. friend had made out a strong case on behalf of a certain class of people. There were cases in Aberdeenshire where tenants had carried out their own improvements largely under the protection, so called, of improving leases. That was a very doubtful and shadowy protection, which might be terminated or destroyed by the conditions which had been so well described by his hon. friend. Perhaps when the Minister for Agriculture had had time to consult the Lord Advocate he would agree that this was a very reasonable concession to make, this slight alteration in the Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would assure them that if they brought in legislation to meet this crying evil he would give them his assistance in getting the Crofters Act extended.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire) said the Amendment appeared to be a very small and moderate concession. It was simply a request that the small holders should be relieved of the penalty for not having obtained the consent of the landlords in carrying out the small improvements which they had made. The hon. and gallant Member for Cheltenham appeared to think that the rights of the landlords would be invaded by this proposal, and that they would be called upon to pay for their own improvements. As a matter of fact, in the case of the small holders which had been so clearly set forth by the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire it was almost impossible that any of the improvements which they carried out would have obtained the consent of the landlords. None of those permanent improvements carried out by the small holders who formed so very large a portion of the cultivators of the soil in Scotland would receive any benefit from the Act. Indeed, so difficult is their position and so impossible is it for them to get the previous consent of the landlord for their small improvements, that the hon. Member who moved this Amendment had provided at the end of the clause that the consent of the landlord would be necessary as regarded future improvements.

*MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) expressed his surprise at the ignorance admitted by the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill in regard to Scotch tenants. He had told them that he knew nothing about these cases in Scotland. He contended that he ought to know about them, and that he should have made it his business to inquire before he brought in legislation for Scotland. The Lord Advocate knew all about his own constituency in Bute and Arran, that dark island where there was no security for the tenant, and where the tenants from year to year were liable to be turned out at very short notice without any compensation. The Lord Advocate would not be able to deny that.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): But I do deny it. I may inform the hon. Member that there are scarcely any tenants there who have not got leases to protect them.

*MR. WEIR replied that there had evidently been an alteration since he was there. From the manner in which the hon. and gallant Member for Cheltenham had spoken one would suppose that he owned the whole of Cheltenham. Probably the hon. and gallant Member was a good landlord, but there were a number of very bad landlords in the north of Scotland, and their existence necessitated the passing of the Crofters Act. The hon. Gentleman who moved this clause only asked for the crofters of the north-east of Scotland similar treatment to those in the west. The holder on the east coast of Scotland had cultivated the land from its wild state; they had built their own houses, erected fences, and brought the land into cultivation, and yet they were liable to be turned out at the shortest notice without any compensation. That was the state of matters existing in the east of Scotland, and the First Lord of the Treasury had practically promised to bring forward some legislation upon this question. The Lord Advocate stated that the Government had not been asked to extend the Crofters Acts to other parts of Scotland where the people were living in precisely the same condition.

GENERAL RUSSELL: The conditions are entirely different. I have property in these districts, and know the condition of the people.

*MR. WEIR said he did not dispute the fact that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had property in Scotland, but he maintained that there were thousands of crofters living under entirely similar conditions to those in the crofter districts, and that it was the duty of the Government to extend the Crofters Acts to them. It was not decent for the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to show so much ignorance in the matter, and he hoped that his hon. friend would divide the House. They would then be able to see who were for and who were against the people.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: May I make an appeal to the President of the Board of Agriculture? I had not the advantage of hearing the speech of my right hon. friend, but if he is correctly represented as stating that small holders in one part of Scotland live under materially different conditions from small holders in another part, I can only state that I am of a different opinion. The conditions are very much the same, and there is in the minds of those persons who are not within the scope of the Crofters Acts a feeling that they have been unfairly excluded because of a geographical distinction. I do not know whether this would be a suitable occasion to remedy this grievance, but I put it to my right hon. friend that this is a reasonable proposition. What is proposed is that if a crofter executes improvements which add to the letting value of his holding he should receive compensation even though the landlord has not given his consent. All the arguments we have heard with regard to this Bill are to the effect that it is intended to put right and redress the wrongs of agriculturists, and on such an occasion we should not pass by any section, however small, of the community. Is it fair that the claim of these small holders, whose improvements have added to the value of their holdings, should not receive our attention? If it be just and right my right hon. friend ought to face it, and I must hear some stronger argument as to why this clause should not be accepted before I will vote against it.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): The clause which I am now about to move touches neither the substance nor the principle of this Bill. It applies solely to Scotland, but though its scope is limited yet I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will see fit to accept it, as it will confer at least some benefit on agriculturists in Scotland. I think I can explain very shortly what the new clause proposes. Under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, the manner in which notice of the termination of a tenancy is to be given is prescribed by the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act, 1853, and the form and mode of procedure under this old Act are by no means inexpensive or easy. But there is a subsequent Scotch Act passed 1886, the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act, under which notice may be given by a registered letter, and the whole effect of this Clause is to substitute notice by registered letter for the old and cumbrous method of giving notice under the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act. I venture to hope that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept this Amendment, inasmuch as it proceeds on the lines of the main object of the Government in proposing this Bill —namely, to institute an inexpensive mode of procedure.

MR. LONG: The Government are prepared to accept the new clause, for the reasons stated by the hon. Member.

New clause—

"From and after the passing of this Act notice of termination of tenancy under Section 28 of The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, may be given in the same manner as a notice of removal under Section 6 of The Removal Terms (Scotland) Act, 1886." —(Mr. Hedderwick.) —brought up and read the first and second time, and added.

MR. BUCHANAN: The Amendment which stands in my name, if carried, would remove the schedules from this Bill, and would make it, I think, a more substantial Bill than it is at present, because it then would lay down in general terms the compensation which a tenant could claim for improvements executed on his farm which added to its value. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he desires to make a substantial improvement in the Agricultural Holdings Act, and when he introduced the Bill he stated that its expressed object was to settle once and for all the differences between owners and occupiers of land. Looked at from that point of view the Bill, when it comes to be considered in detail, is a very small measure indeed. It amends, and to a certain extent improves, the Agricultural Holdings Act, but as for making anything like a settlement of various outstanding questions, or making that radical alteration which is certainly desired by many who have considered this subject, at any rate in Scotland, it is a very small Bill indeed. Of course what may be suitable for England may not be suitable for Scotland, and one of the fundamental difficulties that has arisen is that many of the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman are such as we would not put into a Bill drawn with a view to meeting Scotch opinion. I will only quote two opinions in favour of the Amendment. One is that of the gentleman who represented Scotch farmers on the Committee of Agriculture. In his report he said that in his opinion schedules were unnecessary and should be swept away. The other Gentleman—Mr. Hope —is also a great authority on agriculture. He was a Deputy Commissioner to take evidence in various parts of the country, and made reports with reference to such diverse counties as Oxford, Berkshire, and Aberdeen. In summing up the evidence which he had taken, his first conclusion invariably was that schedules should be abolished, and that all improvements executed by the tenant which enhanced the value of the holding should be paid for by the landlord at the termination of the tenancy. The object of my Amendment is to give effect to what is undoubtedly a general desire on the part of leading agriculturists in Scotland. There can be no objection to this so long as we have complete confidence in the tribunal we are establishing. If we have complete confidence in that tribunal then we may lay down in general terms that the tenant should have the right to obtain compensation for any improvement that adds to the value of the farm.

Amendment proposed to the Bill—

"In page 1, line 6, to leave out the words 'comprised in the First Schedule to this Act.'" —(Mr. Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: I do not think it is necessary for me to go into the questions which have been raised by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman has often told us, speaking as he does apparently for Scotland, the particular views he holds, but at all events he stands somewhat alone in regard to this particular question. So far as the assurances which have reached me from various parts of Scotland go, it is quite evident that there is a general desire on the part of agriculturists in Scotland that this Bill should pass very much in its present form, and I believe that it will confer substantial benefits on Scottish agriculture. The hon. Gentleman in moving this Amendment quoted the opinions of two Scotch agriculturists. Everyone who has had the privilege of knowing these two gentlemen will admit that they speak with the greatest possible authority, and that whether in their agricultural or private capacity they enjoy the respect and confidence of all who have had the good fortune to make their acquaintance, and everyone who knows them would give very great weight to the opinions they express on this or any other agricultural subject; but when they expressed the opinions quoted by the hon. Member they did not appreciate the ineffective character of the method they proposed. It is very difficult to understand from the hon. Gentleman's speech what object he has in view. I understand his object to be that as little limitation as possible should be placed on the right of the tenant to claim compensation. That is undoubtedly a very important feature. But it is by scheduling certain agricultural operations and calling them improvements that we give the tenant a statutory right to claim compensation for an agricultural operation as an improvement which might otherwise be open to doubt. The hon. Gentleman proposes to do away with the schedules altogether, but if the Amendment were carried the Bill would be unworkable, because the words he proposes to leave out are required in the present construction of the Bill. The improvements scheduled are divided into three classes. The first class must be carried out with the consent of the landlord. The second requires notice to the landlord, and the third requires neither consent nor notice. The hon. Gentleman proposes to merge all three, but he does not suggest the machinery by which that can be carried out. While I admit that his desire is to free the tenant, I am bound to say that the adoption of his proposal would leave the tenant in a much worse position than under this Bill. The schedules cover the greater part, if not all, the ground which ought to be covered in regard to improvements carried out by the tenant; and I submit that if the hon. Gentleman is able to show the House that there are agricultural operations which involve improvement to the soil, and which are not included in these schedules, instead of upsetting the whole Bill, he ought to add them in the schedules. If the words were left out, the whole Bill would be upset, and it would not have the effect the hon. Gentleman desires.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I do not think that hon. Members on this side of the House who are interested in agriculture would break their hearts if the Bill were upset. My hon. friend's proposal is that the tenant should get full compensation for any operation on the farm which would have the effect of improving the letting value of the land. If there is full faith in the valuator, he would decide that where the tenant has done anything unnecessary or had deteriorated the value of the land, the tenant should not get any compensation at all. And quite right, too. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture has not, I think, given full credit to Scotch agricultural opinion. I do not know whether my right hon. friend remembers attending a conference of Scottish agriculturalists, when some home truths were presented to him. These Scottish agriculturists told him that they did not believe his Bill would do much good in Scotland. I reiterate my protest against Scotland being lumped together with England on this question. There should have been a separate Bill for Scotland, where the conditions of agriculture are so different from those of England.

*MR. CHANNING: I support the Amendment on several grounds, but chiefly on the grounds of principle and precedent. The Market Gardeners' Compensation Act of 1895 practically gives assent to the principle involved in the Amendment of my hon. friend. What he has moved is simply to abolish the schedules, and that means that in every contract of tenancy there should be implied the complete right of the tenant to execute any improvement which will increase the value of the holding for the purposes for which it was let, and to obtain compensation for doing so under the arbitrator's award. My right hon. friend has urged that it would be better to have the schedules and that they increase the power of the tenant to obtain compensation; because the tenant would have a list of the improvements that might be made, and if his improvements were in that list he would be able to set up a case. I wonder if the right hon. Gentleman has heard of the discussions in the Central Chamber of Agriculture, which ended in a recommendation that there should be several additions to the list of items in respect of which payment might be made, and—

"Finally, any other improvements increasing the letting value of an agricultural holding, not specifically mentioned in the schedules, and for which a tenant is not otherwise compensated."

That recommendation, though shown by practical opinion to be necessary, is obviously a reductio ad absurdum of the whole theory of schedules. My hon. friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire quoted the opinion of Mr. Clay and Mr. James Hope. He might have quoted many others who came before the Commission, and desired that the most absolute freedom should be given to the tenant to make improvements. I may say that this is not a merely Scotch contention. On the contrary, the principle was first embodied in the English Market Gardeners Compensation Act in 1895. That Act was the outcome of a custom which had grown up among the fruit-growers of the Vale of Evesham of recognising the absolute right of the tenants to carry out improvements in their own way. I might also quote Mr. Drew, the Secretary of the Farmers' Club, who repeatedly expressed the opinion that the schedules should be done away with, and that a general presumption should be established of the right of the tenants to make improvements with a right to compensation, unless where waste or damage had been done to the holding. That principle had the support of many practical farmers, including former chairmen of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and also the strong support of the fruit growers of Kent. It seems to me that a very substantial case has been made out for the Amendment. I have myself taken the intermediate course of suggesting that some items of the schedule should be transferred from Part 1 to Part 2, and others from Part 1 to Part 3, as a compromise. At the same time, as a matter of principle, I think that ultimately we shall arrive at the system proposed in the Amendment, of recognising all improvements which are reasonable and suitable for the purposes for which a holding is let, and we should thus get rid of a great deal of needless friction. The landlord would, of course, remain able at common law to prevent improper experiments by the tenant on the holding he has on lease. In any case, my hon. friend is well advised in raising this question by his Amendment. The principle is one upon which legislation will ultimately proceed, and I certainly will give him my support.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I should not like it to go forth that the Central Chamber of Agriculture favours the abolition of the schedule. I may remind the House that the first schedule is divided into three parts. The first sets forth the things which may be done on a farm, after getting the consent of the landlord; the second, the improvements in respect of which notice to the landlord is required; and the third, the improvements in respect of which the consent of or notice to the landlord is not required. The Central Chamber of Agriculture did not favour the abolition of this schedule.

*Mr. CHANNING: I only mentioned that several leading farmers advocated, in the Chambers, the abolition of the schedules, and that two former presidents of the Central Chamber of Agriculture had expressed the same opinion.

MR. JEFFREYS: The Central Chamber of Agriculture supported the three parts of the schedule very strongly, and only wished to add to them. I hope the House will reject the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, for it would really cut away the whole benefits of the Bill.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Buchanan and Dr. Farquharson.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): Hon. Members will see that the Amendment I now move refers to suburban allotments, which are of a very peculiar nature, and held under a very peculiar tenure. The Allotment Gardens Compensation Act of 1887 does not meet their case, and my Amendment, I venture to say, will do substantial justice to a class of people worthy of the greatest consideration, and will meet a special want in regard to the tenure of land in this country. The land given up to these allotments in the neighbourhood of great towns is land that is ripening for building purposes. It is land outside a ring fence, that cannot be properly attached to a farm, and is often bounded by railways or canals, and consists of loose patches waiting for the builder. In the meantime it is let out in half or three-quarters of a rood to artisans from our great towns, who go out there to obtain some touch with nature and some change from the monotony of factory life. They bring their wives and children with them, and on a Sunday, outside church hours, you will find them in hundreds and thousands enjoying there the best imitation they can obtain of the beauties of nature. In order the better to enjoy this suburban rurality it has grown to be a custom, I may almost say an essential thing, to build a small summer-house, sometimes with a little kitchen range and a chimney, and to furnish it with a table and a few chairs. Frequently the midday meal on a Sunday is partaken in these small summer-houses. A small greenhouse is often found attached; and occasionally, where the gardens are sufficiently removed from the city, there would be a fowl-house or a pig-sty. These buildings, no doubt, are put up without the leave of the landlord. I venture to speak on behalf of the Federation of Allotment Garden Holders Associations, who have carefully considered this matter, and who believe they have a claim for compensation for these buildings when they are compelled to move. Having regard to the moral influence of these suburban allotment gardens, I see no reason why the House should not make it possible for these people to enjoy this semi-rural life on Bank Holidays and Sundays in safety as to the future. I do not complain on their behalf of the high rents they pay, often as much as at the rate of 20 guineas per acre, which is very high compared with agricultural rent in this country. I do not complain of the high rent of twenty guineas per acre. I do not complain of the cottage gardener or the allotment gardener, the class to which I refer, receiving no compensation if against his wish he has to leave his plot because he has to go and live in another town. I do not complain of that at all, but what I do complain of is, that having established these allotment gardens and cultivated them and put up their little buildings upon them on the faith of long custom and long habit, they cannot when that land is sold for building purposes claim any compensation at all. The land is only sold when it is absolutely ripe for building, and it is sold then at a very high profit, and the small amount of compensation that I have suggested in my Amendment the Committee will agree is not too much. The compensation is strictly limited in amount. I shall be told that they have a right to take away the fruit bushes and fruit trees not firmly planted in the land, so to speak. But I would point out to the Committee that one cannot take away from the land with any profit fruit trees and fruit bushes; and the buildings which have been put up are not saleable at all at the price of the cost which they represent. What I wish to do is to obtain for those tenants the right to take away their fruit trees and fruit bushes, and I think on the determination of the tenancy by the action of the landlord and not of the tenant—as in cases where the land has become ripe for immediate building purposes, and the tenant is turned out at six months notice—where there is no compensation at all by the operation of the compensation clause of the existing Act, the tenant ought to have the right to compensation to the extent of one-third of the gross value of his improvements or £10, whichever is the greater sum. I venture to hope that I have shown to the Committee a good case for their favourable consideration. This is a very deserving class, the artisans of the great towns; and from the point of view of public behaviour and public morals, of detachment from less worthy pursuits, of health given to wife and children who are enabled to spend many hours in the spring and summer months amongst the green leaves and away from the shut-in atmosphere of the cities—from the point of view of public interest and national interest generally, and of improving the physique of the people, and detaching them from public-houses and from betting and other forms of amusement far too prevalent in our towns, I ask that the tenant shall be put in a better position than he stands at present. My Amendment is one that is looked upon with great favour by the populations of the large manufacturing towns of this country, and I believe it is the only proposal of this particular kind now before the House. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 12, after the word 'tenant,' to insert the words, 'And the tenant of a holding, being an allotment or cottage garden, shall be entitled to obtain from the landlord compensation in money for fruit trees, fruit bushes, drains, and for any outbuildings, pigsties, fowl-houses, or other structural improvements made by the tenant upon his holding to the extent of one-third of their gross value; provided always that this compensation shall not exceed ten pounds, and that the tenant shall have the right to remove such fruit trees, fruit bushes, outbuildings, pigsties, and fowl-houses in addition to the right to the aforesaid compensation, and that if the tenancy be determined after notice given by the tenant no right to compensation in money shall exist.'"—(Mr. Yoxall.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: The hon. Gentleman has honestly endeavoured to deal with what he no doubt considers a very difficult question, but I very much doubt if the difficulty be as great as he imagines it is, or whether there is any difficulty at all, and I do not know whether the allotment holders, after all, will approve of this Amendment when they find how it works out in their own individual cases. How does the question of compensation stand? The Allotments Act of 1887 provides that the tenants shall receive full compensation for the erection of buildings and other improvements, provided they obtain the assent of the landlords to those improvements in the first instance. Then they can do what they like. The hon. Gentleman proposes by his Amendment that that assent shall be done away with, and that the tenant shall be entitled to compensation to the extent of one-third of the gross value of his property, and then, in order to do justice to the landlord, he proposes that the compensation shall be limited to £10. I cannot conceive how a proposal of this kind could work out equitably throughout the country generally. Everybody agrees with what the hon. Gentleman said as to the desirability of people in the towns having gardens of this character, and everybody who has observed the condition of large towns must be aware of the wonderful increase in the provision of allotments and gardens all over the country. The hon. Gentleman by his proposal not only suggests that the tenant shall be entitled to claim compensation from the landlord with respect to the expenditure and disturbance entailed upon him, but that when the landlord has paid the compensation the tenant shall be entitled to remove the fruit trees and other things which he has sold to the landlord. It is a most remarkable way to arrive at a just compensation, and I cannot believe it will confer the advantage upon the allotment-holders which the hon. Gentleman desires. I am bound to say also that it involves a principle to which I could not assent, that these men are to be allowed to make alterations in the character of their holdings without the consent of the landlord. Therefore, I must resist the Amendment.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I am very sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to accept this Amendment, or some portion of it. There is no real difficulty in this matter; that is shown by the fact that all this large number of associations have asked my hon. friend to move in the matter. It is true that compensation can be claimed if the assent of the landlord in writing has been first obtained, but in the vast majority of the cases the assent of the landlord cannot be obtained, the result being that large amounts of improvements have been confiscated. Of course it is very difficult to say what are improvements on land that is to be used for building and what are not, but at the same time I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman, whilst agreeing to the desirability of doing something, has not seen his way to accept the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir William Walrond and
Mr. Anstruther

*SIR CHARLES WELBY (Nottinghamshire, Newark) : The words of the Amendment which I now beg to move are taken bodily from the existing Act, and therefore it seems to me it falls upon the Government to justify their omission rather than on me to justify their retention. When this question was referred to upstairs, it was pointed out that the proviso was not in the Act of 1883, as it was originally drafted, but was inserted in the Committee stage. But what was the history of its insertion? It was inserted in the Bill of 1883 upon the motion of the right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and it was moved after a more drastic Amendment, which limited the compensation of the tenant to his actual outlay, had been proposed and carried by the present First Lord of the Treasury. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was, with some slight modifications, accepted by the Government and inserted in the Bill, and it was then recognised upon all sides of the House to be a reasonable precaution against possible misunderstanding. This Amendment which I now move will have the same effect in this Bill. I admit that the words are vague and unsatisfactory, but the object of the proviso is, so far as improvements are concerned, to separate as far as possible the interest of the tenant from that of the landlord. I am as anxious as anyone to secure for the tenant full compensation for his outlay, initiative, and energy, but it is perfectly obvious that there must be a point at which one interest ends and the other begins. Take an extreme case which I admit is unlikely to arise, but which shows the principle. A man may, by the mere fact of turning the course of a river, turn 200 acres of worthless swamp into valuable fertile land. But no one contends that in such a case as that he should be entitled to the capital value of all that reclaimed acreage of land. But I confess I can see in this Bill no sort of safeguard against such an extreme interpretation as that being placed upon it. The right hon. Gentleman, as I understood when this question was raised upstairs, objected to the proviso, mainly on the ground that it was of no practical effect. I am not prepared to accept that entirely, but even granting it, I submit that it does not necessarily follow that, because words are in an Act of Parliament and have no effect, the deliberate omission of those words will have no effect. We apprehend, rightly or wrongly, that these words having been in an Act of Parliament, their omission may be construed as an instruction to arbitrators to make some change in their practice, and to ascribe to an outgoing tenant something that has hitherto been recognised by all as inherent with the ownership of the soil. The right hon. Gentleman made the important statement, upstairs, that the Government did not by omitting these words intend any change in the law or in the practice. I would respectfully submit to him that, as the Government do not intend to make any change in the law or in the practice, and as, so far as I am aware, there is no demand for any change; and as, on the other hand, there are apprehensions in many quarters as to what the effect of the omission may be, it would be well to let well alone, and to reinsert these words as part of the law. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 12, after the word 'tenant,' to insert the words, 'Provided always that, in estimating the value of any improvement in Schedule I., there shall not be taken into account, as part of the improvement made by the tenant, what is justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil.'"—(Sir Charles Welby.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: My hon. friend may be quite certain that apart altogether from the distinguished origin of the Amendment, the subject is one which coming from himself would receive my consideration. I confess that when I was anticipating the points of difficulty that might arise in the discussion of this Bill, it never entered my head that this would be one of them. The reason for leaving out the words was accurately described by my hon. friend. He told us something of the history of the way the words got into the Act of 1883. It is quite true that they were words suggested by my right hon. friend, but I am not quite sure that they were suggested by him because he believed they were of very great importance, or far reaching. Now he entirely concurs that they are of no value as they stand. My hon. friend suggests that, although they may be of no value, the fact that they are in the Act of Parliament, and that Parliament is asked to leave them out of this Bill, may have a bearing on future action in this matter. I confess that I have never been able to understand how a landlord is going to consider agricultural operations in connection with the soil without considering in the valuation what is due to the soil itself—how much the soil has paid for the production of the article for which compensation is to be given. My hon. friend thinks the omission of the words may lead to difficulty. The Royal Commission considered these words with the greatest possible care, and made some moderate and sensible recommendations. Mr. Lipscombe spoke in the strongest terms of these words, and other valuers have described them as having a mischievous effect. Recommendations have been made from all quarters that the words should be omitted. They have led to the suggestion, as my hon. friend is aware, that the landlord seeks to deprive the tenant of that which is the result of the tenant's work. This has led to some reflection being cast on the Act of Parliament itself. I have discussed this matter with some of the most experienced valuers I have lately come across, and so far as I know there is no suggestion that the omission of these words would have the far-reaching and serious effect my hon. friend fears. I confess I do not share my hon. friend's fears in any way whatever. I hope the House will accept the suggestion the Government have made and will not assent to the reinsertion of the words.

*EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.) said he regretted extremely that the right hon. Gentleman had not been able to accept the small and reasonable Amendment of his hon. friend. They had really heard no reason whatever, either in the Committee upstairs or in that House, in favour of striking out the words, except the evidence given before the Royal Commission. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to that and it would be worth while to see how absolutely conflicting and contradictory it was. The right hon. Gentleman alluded to the evidence given by Mr. Lipscombe who was in favour of striking out the words, because they were entirely unnecessary and inoperative at the present moment. Sir J. Bennet Lawes, while in favour of the exclusion of the words, was of opinion that they contained a principle which the arbitrators would be bound to take into account in giving an award, whether the words were in the Bill or not. Did Mr. Lipscombe mean that the arbitrators had acted in open defiance of the principles laid down by the law? He should say that was a good reason for appointing a commission of enquiry similar to the Fry Commission, which reported on the working of the Irish Land Acts. If Sir J. Bennet Lawes was correct, what on earth could be the reason for striking the words out of the Bill? A more extraordinary way of enlisting the confidence of either tenant or landlord in the impartiality of this tribunal, to which for the first time they were giving unlimited discretion, while withdrawing the right of appeal which had hitherto existed to the county court, could hardly be imagined. The right hon. Gentleman had stated in reference to the history of the matter, that although it was true these words were inserted in the Bill in 1883, on the motion of the right hon. Gentleman who was now Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was not at all sure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer at that time attached any importance to them. All he knew was that his right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury moved an Amendment in 1883 on the Bill of the then Government—a far more stringent one—providing that compensation to tenants in case of improvements executed without the consent of the landlord should be limited to the amount of the capital expenditure by the tenant. He carried that Amendment against the Government, and the Government was so annoyed that they proceeded to suggest that the Amendment by the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be accepted in place of the Amendment by his right hon. friend. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer, in moving the Amendment, used words quite incompatible with the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman, that he attached no importance to it. He said—

"He was bound to say he thought there would be something required in the Bill in the nature of a limit to the discretion of the valuer beyond the words 'inherent capabilities of the soil.'"

Later on the right hon. Gentleman said—

"What he was anxious to do was to enable this Bill to work if it could; and what he was convinced of was this—that it would be difficult enough for the first part of the Schedule to work under any circumstances, for he did not believe the tenantry of England were likely, so long as the English land system endured, to desire to make these permanent improvements. But if the Committee wished to deter landlords from giving their assent to the making of these permanent improvements by the tenants, they could not do better than leave it open to the valuer to give to the tenant compensation for that which really belonged to the landlord. Therefore, he was anxious to limit the action of the valuers in this matter, as the Government themselves desired, and to show in the four corners of the Bill that the valuers were not to take that course. The landlord, if he gave his consent to the permanent improvements being made, would not then be under any fear that he would be deprived of any property which belonged to him; and with that view he had proposed this Amendment."

It appeared, therefore, that he did attach importance to it at the time. A protest ought to be made against this kind of slipshod legislation to which they were becoming accustomed in connection with all questions relating to agriculture. The Government pretended that these words were unnecessary, or at any rate that they might raise conflict and misunderstanding, and instead of taking the trouble to devise some phrase to express their meaning better, they asked the House to strike the words out of the Bill. Surely the English language was capable of giving such a definition. They might find words which would not be open to the objections urged against this proviso in Ricardo's "Original and Indestructible Properties of the Soil," or in the definitions of any treatise on political economy. Instead of trying to devise an alternative they trusted absolutely to the impartiality of gentleman who, it had been stated, paid no attention to the principles of the statute under which they act. It was said in evidence before the Royal Commission that these words might deter tenants from coming forward with claims of a certain character. If there was one difficulty in this legislation it was that it encouraged a tenant to believe that by a dexterous manipulation of his claim he might extract from the arbitrator something to which he had no right and which the law never intended to give him. The result was that the landlord had to make an equally exaggerated claim, and the arbitrators, in order to save themselves the trouble of going into the matter, took the easy way of splitting the difference. In some form or other words should be introduced which would limit and restrict the discretion of the arbitrator.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle) confessed he was somewhat disappointed at the reply of the President of the Board of Agriculture, because he thought the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give a better reason for his opposition to the Amendment than he had done. When he came to the House that night he did not think this was a point they should press on the Government; but, considering the small excuse the Government so far had given for leaving out the words which appeared in every other Agricultural Act dealing with holdings, he should feel himself bound to support his hon. friend unless they got some better explanation. The two hon. Members who had just spoken had fully gone into the history of the words and the reason for the Amendment. He would give one example to the House of a thing which might occur, and which might bring this question very much to the front. Suppose that some year there was a considerable rise in the price of wheat and barley. Hon. Members were perfectly well aware that there was a large amount of land at the present moment which no longer could be worked at a profit in growing corn. On the other hand, it produced an indifferent and inferior article, and would let at from 2s. 6d. to 5s. an acre. That land, if ploughed and cultivated, would certainly produce a rent of 15s. to £1 an acre. He wished to ask the House whether it was fair that the whole of that increase should go to the tenant. Undoubtedly the "inherent capabilities of the soil" were what would grow the wheat. It would not be wheat of five quarters to the acre, which would pay cultivation at present prices. It would only produce three-quarters to the acre. He saw no reason why such words should not be placed in the Bill, so that valuers should at all times know how to act.

MR. SEALE HAYNE (Devonshire, Ashburton) said he only wished to bring before the House his view of "the inherent capabilities of the soil." What did a tenant pay for when he paid rent? He paid for the inherent capabilities of the soil. If those capabilities were good he paid a high rent, and if they were bad he paid a low rent. There was no such thing as the inherent capabilities of the soil, because the soil without labour and without manure would produce nothing that was marketable. [Cries of "Oh!"] Certainly not. If they put by an acre of land and did not work it, that acre of land would produce nothing of any marketable value. The soil had no inherent capabilities unless worked by tenants. If these words were worth anything, and if they resulted in anything being got out of the tenant, it would really be robbing him.

MR. PHILIPPS (Pembrokeshire): I do not pretend to be quite certain what effect the omission of these words will have, but the right hon. Gentlemen in charge of the Bill, as far as I understood him, assured the House that whether or not the words are in the Bill will make no difference in the minds of the valuers, and he proposes to leave them out only as being more or less immaterial. It is possible that may be so, but for my own part I have some hope that if these words are omitted valuers will be inclined, from the very fact of their omission from this Bill, while they were inserted in a previous Bill, to give to the outgoing tenant a larger sum as compensation than they would have been inclined to give. I therefore hope the Government will stick to their guns and insist that these words should not be added to the clause. I desire to take this opportunity of putting in a protest against some of the arguments by which this Amendment has been justified. The hon. Baronet the mover gave us what he evidently considered was a most shocking example. He said that unless the Bill was safeguarded by these words a case might happen in which a man took a farm with even as much as one hundred acres of swamp upon it—swamp that was absolutely useless—and by altering the course of a river turned that swamp into most valuable land. That is the way the hon. Baronet looked at it, but it seems to me, looking at it from the Liberal point of view—and I fancy most agricultural constituencies, whether they return Liberals or Conservatives to this House, will have much the same opinion—that if a man takes a farm which has an acre of swamp, worth practically nothing to anybody, and by turning the course of a river or stream makes that swamp into good meadow land, the man is fairly entitled to every penny the land is worth.

SIR CHARLES WELBY: But he may reclaim a thousand acres.

MR. PHILIPPS: Suppose a man improves one acre of land, he is entitled to compensation. Why is he less entitled if he improves a thousand acres? It has been laid down that a man benefited his country if he made two blades of grass to grow where one blade grew before. But the man who drains a swamp makes many hundreds of blades to grow where only one grew before, and if the man who makes two to grow is a benefactor to his country, the man who makes a hundred to grow is much more a benefactor. This may shock the hon. Baronet; he appears to think it may be reasonable that a man who reclaims one acre of bog should get compensation, but he speaks of the possibility of a man getting compensation for reclaiming a thousand acres as a very terrible thing. If it is a good thing to reclaim an acre surely it is a better thing to reclaim two acres, and a far better thing to reclaim a thousand, and the man who does such a deed certainly deserves every penny of the advantage his labour or skill has given to the land. After all, it is not generally such an easy thing to drain land, and if a man has the skill to drain a thousand acres of bog land on a remunerative basis—that is, so that the land is worth more than the amount he spends in draining it—he certainly is entitled to all the credit and advantage. That is my view of the principles on which the House ought to legislate, and if the omission of these words will lead to the man who drains land getting the benefit I earnestly hope the House will condemn the Amendment. I dissent altogether from the arguments of the noble Lords sitting opposite. I say that a tenant ought to get the benefit of any improvement to the value of the holding when he leaves it, which is due to inherent capabilities of the soil. My right hon. friend the Member for the Ashburton Division put the matter very clearly. What is it that a man pays for when he takes land? Some men rent land at 5s. an acre, and some rent land at £2 an acre—grass-land in a similar county, one part being poor and the other rich grass-land. What does a man pay for if he pay £2 rather than 5s. an acre? Surely he pays for "the inherent capabilities of the soil"? I say that he is entitled to the benefit of those capabilities, and it would be most unjust if, by such an Amendment as the hon. Baronet proposes, the tenant was shut out from these advantages. As regards some of the matters in the first schedule of this Bill, unless a man is benefited by the improvement of the soil I cannot understand how a valuer can give compensation. The tenant can only get compensation if the land is benefited and gives increased crops. I hope the Government will stand to their guns and refuse to accept this Amendment. If the Amendment is accepted the heart of the Bill will be struck out, and it will be nothing more than a mockery and a sham.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) thought the ingenuity and eloquence of the hon. Member for Pembroke had been somewhat misapplied. The practical question they had to decide was not whether these words were wisely introduced in the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883, but whether their extrusion from the existing law at the present time might not have an injurious and unfair effect upon the rights of the owners of the soil. If these words were retained from the Act of 1883, it would enable the arbitrator to give something to the tenant which he was not entitled to give him at present. He laid very little stress himself upon these words, and he was quite prepared to admit that it was a very difficult thing to translate them into pounds, shillings, and pence. If they had never been in the Act of 1883, he did not think that he should have voted for leaving them in this Act. But there they were, and so far they had worked no injustice, and if there had been ambiguity it had not been followed by any serious consequences. The question was whether the words should be taken out or not. He thought some further reason should be given for taking them out. Let the House look at the matter in a plain and simple way. They were not dealing for the moment with existing tenants. The tenant paid for the inherent capacities of the soil in the shape of rent. He took his farm upon certain terms—it might be from year to year, or for a longer period—but as long as he had the farm he had the use of the inherent capacities of the soil to treat as he liked, with the assistance of his skill, his capital, and his labour. Therefore, the tenant got what he bargained for. Then they came to the position of things between the parties when the contract was at an end. It was right that the tenant should be compensated for what was due to his own exertions and industry and his capital, and the present Bill gave compensation for those matters. But when it came to putting into his own pocket money which, by the very wording of this clause, was due not to what he had done, but to the inherent capacities of something which belonged to another man, and the use of which he had had for a certain period of time, and for which he had paid, then he thought that was not the tenant's property, but the property of the landlord. For what those words were worth, he thought it was a pity to throw them away in the present Bill. He somewhat regretted that those words were ever introduced in the Bill of 1883, but being there, the question the House was called upon to decide was, whether it was right and wise to abandon them, and thus open a loophole which would enable an arbitrator to give a tenant compensation not for what he had done, but for what was really and truly the property of the landlord.

MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire): I do not gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of this Bill that in maintaining the omission of these words he was animated by any particular abstract principle. On the contrary, I gather that there was no principle of any sort at the back of his opposition, and if any justification is wanted of the practical sagacity of the hon. Gentleman in trying to get rid of these words it is to be found in the debate which has taken place. I cannot help thinking that the House has discussed this question in a somewhat innocent fashion. Hon. Members have spoken as if this was some virgin soil which they could till, and there has been in addition the argument about "inherent capabilities." They leave out of account the fact that what they are contemplating is ground which has already been discussed. This very question gave rise to the famous case of "Adams v. Dunseath," and I for one contemplate with abhorrence the notion that the controversy which that case let loose in Ireland should now be let loose on this side of St. George's Channel. As that controversy was entirely the outcome of these words, I think the only practical expedient for us to adopt now is to omit them. It is a great delusion to suppose that the practical man who comes to value the improvements of the tenants takes into account the inherent capabilities of the soil. On the contrary, what he does is, not to think of the inherent capacities of the soil, but to apportion the value of the improvements between the labour of the tenant and something which is the subject-matter on which he has been operating. The valuer is generally some practical farmer with a great knowledge of agriculture and valuations, and he asks himself, what has the tenant substantially contributed to the improvement of the farm? So far from drawing a distinction between the inherent capacities of the soil and the labour of the tenant, he does nothing of the sort. He makes no such distinction, because it is a purely metaphysical one, and it has no practical value. In considering what the tenant does to add value to the soil, some account of course must be taken of what is due to the inherent qualities of the soil. The tenant would not have occupied the soil unless he believed it had some inherent qualities of which he could take advantage. On the other hand, to imagine that there is some hard-and-fast line to be drawn between what is due to the inherent capacities of the soil and what is due to the labour of the tenant is really raising a figment of the imagination of philosophers and lawyers. I object to introducing a figment of philosophers and lawyers into this controversy between landlord and tenant. The practical man is quite capable of dealing with this question, and of distinguishing between what is due to the inherent qualities of the soil and what is due to the tenant; he will take a broad view, and consider whether a particular tenant has, by his labour and his money, made an improvement of that kind which the Act of Parliament lays down. The Act of Parliament is not one which embodies any abstract principle, and I never knew any Act which did embody an abstract principle which anybody could understand; and least of all does the Agricultural Holdings Act provide any logical basis which would enable the unfortunate valuer to consider the subtleties which were raised by the noble Lord the Member for South Kensington. The valuer has to look at these things from a business point of view, and if he were instructed otherwise I should protest against him being made arbitrator in the controversies under this Act, because he would not be fit for the duties imposed upon him. Heaven forbid that we should place any such burden upon the back of the unfortunate arbitrator as was raised in "Adams v. Dunseath." There is not very much chance of the arbitrator making a mistake, and if he does no court of law would endeavour to correct him, and because these words seem to introduce ambiguity into what is otherwise quite clear I think the Government have acted wisely in omitting those words.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): I think it comes rather strangely from the hon. and learned Member for Haddington that he should charge hon. Members on this side with being philosophers and lawyers. But, to turn to the more serious part of his speech, he very properly pointed out that this was anything but virgin ground, and that these questions had all been gone through in 1883. It must have amused the older hon. Members of this House to hear the way in which this subject was dealt with by my noble friend behind me. There is one remarkable difference between the state of things which existed in 1883 and now, and it is that whereas everyone of the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench voted "aye" in 1883, they propose to vote "no" now. I do not suppose that I can raise a blush on the cheek of an official, but I think this fact fully justifies us in asking for some further explanation for the complete change of front which has taken place. These words which we desire to retain were introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and were strongly supported by the First Lord of the Treasury, and now the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill says they are unimportant, and he also says that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has come to the same conclusion. I observe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not present to face the music, and he has not come forward to explain why he pressed the House to carry in 1883 words which he now considers unimportant and mischievous. But why are these words mischievous? We asked the right hon. Gentleman to explain, and all he could tell us was that some eminent valuer had said they were mischievous. A man might be capable of estimating what was fair between landlord and tenant, and yet not be a safe guide for us in a matter of legislation, and I really think we ought to have some explanation from a member of the Government as to what is the mischief and what is the harm which the words proposed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer have done. What was the great mischief he did to the country by his proposal? I should like to have that question answered. What does the right hon. Gentleman say? He says that every valuer will act exactly as if these words were there, and that it is the only honest course to take. The hon. Member opposite proceeded to say that there was no inherent value in land. That proposition is a most ridiculous one. It would be just as reasonable to say that any farmer could grow just as good a wheat crop on the floor of this House as upon any piece of land of the same size in the country. The proposition is so ludicrous that I am surprised to hear the hon. Member defend it. If the words which existed in this Bill were carried out by the valuers it would be a robbery. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to leave out those words because he says that robbery will continue whether the words are there or not. I cannot help saying that the right hon. Gentleman is playing into the hands of people who differ from him absolutely upon this question. The right hon. Gentleman showed something less than his usual prescience when he expressed official astonishment that there should be any objection to the omission of these words. It never occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that the words introduced by a leading member of this Government and supported by the Leader of the House, and which were produced as a protection and safeguard to the landlords against robbery, would be defended by anybody in this House, and he did not think we should take the trouble to protest against such a motion.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I am induced to make a very few observations and to interpose in this interesting debate by the reference which has been made by my hon. and learned friend the Member for Haddington to the celebrated historic case of Adams v. Dunseath. I am very glad to see my hon. friend on the front Ministerial Bench, who is very familiar with that case. He will probably follow me, and if I say anything which does not commend itself to his logical mind perhaps he will be good enough to correct me. I confess that I am rather inclined to favour the insertion of those words, but on grounds altogether different from those which commended themselves to the noble Lord who so ably and eloquently defended this Amendment, and on grounds different from those put forward by the hon. Members who have supported him. Those words do not occur at all in the Irish Land Act, for there are no cognate words referring to the capabilities of the soil in that statute. The difference arose to some extent from those words not occurring. On the one hand the landlord contended that all the tenant was entitled to was the actual capital expended on his improvements, with interest say at 5 per cent. from the time the capital was expended. That was one pole of the question. On the other hand, what was contended for by the tenant was that the landlord was only entitled to what was termed and became a historic phrase—that is, the prairie value of the land. That is there was the prairie value on one hand and the capital value and interest on the other. I confess that in Ireland the question of the prairie value would be very different to what it would be in England. If we went back to what was done by the tenants in Ireland it would be found that the land was actually reclaimed from its wild and prairie state by the exertions, the labour, and the industry of the tenants from generation to generation. That is not so in England, because the tenants do not go back in that way. There have been leases in England, and it can easily be ascertained what was the state of the soil when the tenancy commenced. My idea is, that if you leave in these words they will at once challenge inquiry as to what the precise measure of compensation that the tenants should get is, and it will prevent the arbitrator from applying that very valuable standard of common sense which is so popular with everyone when they can clearly understand the meaning of it. But there is nothing more dangerous, in my opinion, than common sense. It is very frequently a convertible term with the particular opinions of the person who applies it, which are often chimerical, and which lead to obvious errors. My idea of the effect of this Amendment is this: Dean Swift said that the man who made two blades of grass grow where only one grew before was a benefactor to his country. That is the principle on which I go. If a man makes two blades of wheat grow where only one grew before, what would justice and equity say? Why, that he should have one blade for himself, and the landlord should have the other blade for allowing him the use of the soil. I defy the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Derby, with whose logical and metaphysical powers the House is so familiar, to meet that argument. Supposing a tenant makes two blades of wheat grow where no wheat at all would have grown but for the exertions of the tenant. Is the tenant to get the two blades, and is nothing to remain for the landlord but the value of the virgin soil upon which the two blades grew? This is what creates the difficulty. If the land was not there, you might as well attempt to grow wheat on the floor of this House. The only true solution is, I think, that the tenant ought to receive compensation for every improvement he has applied to the soil, and all the landlord should get is the value of the uncultured and uncultivated soil at the time the letting was made. I will not trouble the House any further, and I should not have spoken at all but for the fact that the case of Adams v. Dunseath was mentioned, and I may say that the case is still sub judice, and is as far from a solution as ever it was.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): We have been told in this debate that common sense is the most injurious quality a man can possess, and that no soil possesses any inherent capabilities. I rise mainly because I am anxious to defend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his regrettable absence, against the attack of the hon. Member for St. Albans, who has complained that the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed a clause in the original Act, and is not here to prevent its extrusion by the Government of which he is a member. Does the hon. Member forget the difference between being in opposition and being in power? I think the hon. Member for St. Albans should remember that when a distinguished Member of this House is in Opposition he acts in accordance with his conscience and knowledge, and votes against nefarious schemes like the Finance Act of 1884, but when he comes into office his conscience is changed and "as bees on flowers alighting cease to hum," so on going into office Chancellors of the Exchequer are dumb. That is the explanation. The right hon. and learned Serjeant opposite spoke of this Amendment as if it proposed to insert something in the Bill. That, I assert, is a wrong way of putting it. The proposal of the Government is to leave something out. Let us remember that this Bill and the existing Act are one, and must be read one with the other, and everything that is done is subject to the provisions of both. If you repealed the existing law, and were starting anew, I think it would be arguable whether these words should be inserted, but the proposal apparently now is that we should leave out these words, while at the same time we keep them in, because we keep them in for reference but leave them out for legislative effect. Now, what is the result? The President of the Board of Trade told us that every arbitrator must have in mind the principle embodied in this Amendment—namely, that whatever is derived from the inherent capabilities of the soil should not be subject to compensation. He said that that principle must necessarily be in the mind of the arbitrator, whether we put in these words or not, but when an arbitrator comes to these two Acts, and the other nine Acts to which I will not now refer, he will have to consider them together. He will find in the first Act that he is directed not to take into account such part of the improvement made by the tenant as is justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, but he will also find that in the latest Act the Government, of malice prepense, have advisedly struck out these words, and he will take that as an overt direction to himself that he is no longer to proceed on the old Act but on the new. If you repealed the first Act it would be the cleaner way of doing it. Why not repeal all the nine Acts, and then set forth what you mean in a new Act? But, for reasons which we all know, the Government will not undertake that. Instead, the Government are legislating by allusion. They are superimposing the present Bill on the old Act, and are saying to the arbitrator, "We told you in 1883 that when you came to your arbitration you must not take into account in awarding compensation such part of the improvement made by the tenant as was justly due to the inherent capabilities of the soil. Now, in the Act of 1900 we leave out in the most marked manner the clause giving that particular direction." Would not any arbitrator, any man of common sense, even any lawyer, say at once, "Oh, I understand what is meant. In 1883 I was told to take into account the inherent capabilities of the soil, but in 1900 I have not got to do anything of the kind." It is as plain as a pikestaff. One other point. In the list of improvements in the schedule there are very few indeed to which this clause would apply. It would not apply to the putting up or taking down of fences or the erection or enlargement of buildings, and I do not think it would apply to "warping or weiring of land," a cryptogram which I hope in due course will be explained. If hon. Gentlemen will go through the list, they will find very few improvements in which the inherent capabilities of the soil are involved at all. That being so, the principle is not a very large one. It is undoubtedly a just one, and was recognised as such by that great and most eminent professor of justice the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in 1883, though I am perfectly certain that, if by the merest accident the right hon. Gentleman were not away at the present moment, although he was here most of the afternoon, he would not now defend it. I do not know why he has changed his opinion. It is true that he has sold his land, though that may not have altered his principles. At any rate, he is not here to defend the abandonment of a principle he maintained in 1883, and which with great difficulty he embodied in the Act of that year. When such a course is proposed, it demands adequate justification, and no such justification has been yet given. We have been told that the arbitrator will bear the principle in mind, but I have endeavoured to show that he will take the omission of these words as a direction that he is not to have the regard for them which he was required to have by the Act of 1883. Consequently, in my opinion no case whatever has been made out for the omission.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I only desire to say a few words in order to bring the discussion back to a practical issue. After all, the question we have to decide is whether it is really necessary, for the protection of landlords against unjust claims, that these words should remain as they were in the Act of 1883. I have listened very carefully to this debate, and the one consideration which inclined me to support this Amendment was the line taken by hon. Members opposite, who seemed to hope that the omission of these words would enable an entire change to take place. One hon. Member even stated that the whole value of the Bill would be destroyed if the words were inserted, and evidently a great deal of importance is attached to them. However, we have the assurance of my right hon. friend in charge of the Bill that he has no such intention as is evidently entertained by hon. Members opposite, but I do not think that we can attach very much importance to that, because after all it is not intentions, but words and the interpretation of words, we have to consider. When we come to the particular point as to what the landlords risk by leaving out these words, it will be seen that the risk is limited to the first schedule of the Bill. In the case mentioned by my hon. friend of ploughing up a field to convert it into wheat land, there would be no claim for compensation under this Bill in respect to that particular matter, and as regards the other case of the diverting of a river, that is not in the schedule at all, or, if it is in the schedule, it would come under "watercourses," where the consent of the landlord would be required, and he would therefore be able to protect himself. The possibility of injury to the landlord is confined to the third part of the first schedule, but I think where a tenant cultivates land as a mere matter of cultivation he is entitled to any improvement which he may hand on to the landlord. After all, that is the foundation of the Bill. If the cultivator improves the landlord's property he is to be entitled to the value of that improvement, which the landlord is able to charge the next tenant for. Therefore I do not think that taking out these words is likely to injure the landlords. Then is there any advantage in taking them out? I think there is. I do not think that their being in really affects the matter of compensation one way or the other, but, as was so ably pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire, they would really confuse the mind of the valuer. I cannot imagine anything more difficult than two valuers, one taking into account these words and the other not considering them, endeavouring to arrive at the value of a farm. One may argue that all the improvements are due to the inherent capabilities of the soil, and the other may argue, not I think very forcibly, that they are all due to the farmer. Therefore you get great confusion in practice; and, after all, the advantage of keeping these words in is not great. Speaking from a practical standpoint, I think on the whole that it is desirable that they should be omitted.

LORD HUGH CECIL: I congratulate my hon. friend on having brought back the discussion to a more serious vein. We have heard a lesson in political economy from the hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire in his character as a man of common sense, and we also listened to the right hon. and learned Gentleman describing the celebrated case of Adams v. Dunseath, and though we might unbend in the gravity of our discussions a little, I think it is important that we should make it clear that this Amendment has a serious side, and that it was not moved for the purpose of pointing out any supposed inconsistency on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer or of dwelling on those other more humorous sides developed in the course of the debate. It appears to us to contain a principle of importance, and I confess that it is my opinion that the Amendment is one which ought to be included in the Bill. It cannot be shown that any harm will result from it, and it could not confuse the mind of an arbitrator who was capable of understanding the words of the Amendment, which have a very plain meaning to a man of common sense. The President of the Board of Agriculture brought forward a long catalogue of cases which this clause would affect, but he did not produce one solitary atom of evidence that it had ever produced the smallest evil in the past. When you come to the other side of the question, it is remarkable that its omission has been accepted by hon. Members opposite as making a great change. One hon. Member went so far as to say that the Amendment would knock the heart out of the Bill if it were accepted, and several hon. Members have been at pains to argue that it ought not to be accepted, but I cannot understand why these words should not be put into the Bill to carry out the intention which the Government admit they have. I cannot believe it is safe to leave words out now which have been in the Act up to the present. Would any arbitrator understand that the deliberate omission of these words meant nothing whatever? What kind of an arbitrator would he have to be? According to the Government he would have to be a person not able to understand very plain words, or not even able to attach any importance to the deliberate omission of important words. In fact, the Government are relying on the natural incapacity of the arbitrator. The safest course is to accept the Amendment. It cannot do any harm, and may be very important. If the Government have some verbal criticisms, which prevent them from approving this particular form of words, let the words be put in now, and they can be amended in another place. It is most unsafe to leave out words which have been in an Act of Parliament for several years, and which every arbitrator is familiar with, in order to start arbitrators on a new course of procedure. Let us retain the words, and we may rely on it that the arbitrators will understand them in the future as they have understood them in the past.

Lord Hugh Cecil

*Mr. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon) said it appeared to him that the hon. Member for King's Lynn, in the references which he had made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had forgotten that when the Act of 1883 was introduced, the existing Act, that of 1875, provided a method of compensation by taking the outlay as a starting point, and then deducting so much for each year that had elapsed since the outlay. Then the Act of 1883 introduced for the first time the principle of giving as compensation to the outgoing tenant what the improvement was fairly worth to the incoming tenant. On that change there was a good deal of apprehension lest more should be given than was justly due to the efforts of the tenant, and the present First Lord of the Treasury proposed to meet the danger by saying in no case should the compensation exceed the outlay. That was objected to, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to get over the difficulty by introducing the words which were the subject of the present discussion. But since those words were inserted in the Act of 1883 they had had a mass of evidence from valuers and agriculturists against their retention, and had also witnessed the subtle and expensive controversy in the case of Adams v. Dunseath. They were not, therefore, now in the same position as in 1883. For his own part, he saw nothing inconsistent in the right hon. Baronet proposing those words at that date and being quite willing to assent to the course now proposed by the Board of Agriculture on the advice of their skilled advisers and after the experience of the intervening years. The words in question were from the outset regarded with misgiving. They were dangerous because on the one hand they might mean nothing but what every arbitrator would see for himself if he applied his mind to decide what was the fair value to the incoming tenant, who, if the improvement had not been made, would have received the land with its inherent capabilities; but, on the other, they might gravely embarrass a sensitive and cautious arbitrator who felt it difficult to consider anything as an improvement to which the inherent capabilities of the soil had not responded. He should support the Government in declining to accept the Amendment.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: I hope that the President of the Board of Agriculture will adhere to the attitude he has taken up as regards this matter. Hon. Members who have spoken have forgotten that public opinion has developed enormously since the time compensation was first given for tenants' improvements. We are now familiar with the fact that these provisions have worked without any injury to the landlords' interests, and for the protection of the tenants' interests. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that the aspect presented by the House of Commons in discussing a very grave and serious matter of this kind has not been such as agriculturists will regard with favour. This Bill may be called the charter of the tenant farmers, and I can assure my noble friend that there is no proposal that will be looked upon with greater suspicion than the proposal to revive words which have been looked upon with the greatest aversion. The confusion which has attended the attempts of lawyers to explain these words is, in my opinion, a most convincing reason why this House should not have any more to do with them.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

MR. HALDANE said he moved the Amendment standing in his name with a strong sense that the Government, in inserting Sub-section 4, Clause 1, had made a really honest attempt to meet a difficulty. But it seemed to him that while it would meet the difficulty in some fashion, it ran counter to the principle of the Bill, which was the abolition of all penal clauses. The sub-section, as it left the Grand Committee, was as follows—

"In the ascertainment of the amount of the compensation payable to a tenant in respect of manures as defined by this Act, there shall be taken into account the value of the manure required by the contract of tenancy or by custom to be returned to the holding in respect of any crops sold off or removed from the holding within the last two years of the tenancy or other less time for which the tenancy has endured."

Now, that left it open to the landlord who desired to prevent the sale of way-going crops—a thing which the tenant had a perfect right to do—to defeat that right by putting in a stipulation that the tenant should not be entitled to sell his way-going crops except on condition of putting on the land, say, 1,000 tons of manure. Accordingly, the result would be that the tenant's claim for compensation in respect of unexhausted manures would be wiped out, contrary to the intention of the Bill. He quite admitted that the Government had a good motive in bringing in that sub-section. As the law stood under the old Act the tenant had to submit to a deduction, which was assessed on a principle which, however fair to the tenant, was purely hypothetical, and gave no guidance to the arbitrator. In substance the tenant was entitled to compensation for unexhausted manures, but subject to the deduction of an amount which the arbitrator might think would be equivalent to the consumption on the holding of the way-going crops in the ordinary course of good husbandry. The objection to the Act of 1883 was that it put on the arbitrator the burden of making his calculations on a hypothetical basis of fact. The Government, wishing to get rid of that difficulty, put in this clause to make it a matter of bargain; but the draftsman overlooked the fact that the effect of so doing was to penalise the tenant who sold his way-going crops. He confessed that, having meditated over this subject a good deal, he could not think the Government proposal was satisfactory. He recognised the difficulty of the old clause; but he also saw very clearly the difficulty of the new clause inserted in Grand Committee. The arbitrator was to ascertain the manurial value of the way-going crops. He objected to the introduction into the English language of such a phrase as "manurial value." It seemed to him that the calculation of manurial value involved a problem to the arbitrator as great as a calculation on a hypothetical basis of fact. Probably the least evil would be to go back to the policy of the old Act. If his Amendment were accepted, Sub-section 4 of Clause 1 would read as follows—

"In the ascertainment of the amount of the compensation payable to a tenant in respect of manures as defined by this Act there shall be taken into account the value of the manures that would have been produced by the consumption on the holding according to the rules of good husbandry of any crops sold off and removed from the holding within the last two years of the tenancy, or other less time for which the tenancy has endured, except in so far as a proper return of manure to the holding has been made in respect of such produce so sold off or removed."

He hesitated to assert that that represented the "good common sense" desiderated by the noble Member for Greenwich; but it was common sense, and just what a good arbitrator would do. He was sure it was the best basis on which they could work, and he could not help thinking that if the Government were to consider the matter a little longer they would agree to it. He would, however, be perfectly content if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake, before the Bill came up in another place, to devise some words which would restore the sounder basis of the old state of the law, with such additions as would get rid of the puzzling calculations the arbitrator had at present to make.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 23, to leave out the words from the word 'manure' to the word 'endured,' inclusive, in line 27, and insert the words, 'that would have been produced by the consumption on the holding according to the rules of good husbandry of any crops sold off and removed from the holding within the last two years of the tenancy, or other less time for which the tenancy has endured, except in so far as a proper return of manure to the holding has been made in respect of such produce so sold off or removed.'"—(Mr. Haldane.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'required by' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: The description which the hon. and learned Gentleman has given of the history of the Amendment is quite accurate. The difficulties which arose were practical difficulties. When the Act of 1883 was passed it was no doubt the general practice for tenants to enter into an agreement which precluded them altogether from selling off their way-going crops. There are now three different positions in regard to this matter. Under the first the tenant is absolutely prohibited from the sale of the way-growing crops. Second, he is allowed to sell, subject to the replacement of manures of equivalent value; and third, he is given a free hand. If the hon. and learned Gentleman's Amendment were adopted a fresh difficulty would arise; because if the tenant exercised his undoubted right to sell, yet the fact that he had sold would have to be considered in adjudicating his claim for compensation, and therefore he would be penalised by the adoption of these words as they stand. The words adopted by the Government in endeavouring to meet the three different cases are unquestionably open to the construction which the hon. and learned Gentleman has placed upon them. Undoubtedly the hon. and learned Gentleman is right in saying that one of the main objects which the Government had before them was to get rid of the penal clauses; and by Clause 6 of this Bill the penal clauses are practically got rid of, with, of course, certain limitations. It certainly is true that under Sub-section 4 of this clause, as it left the Grand Committee, something of the form of a penal clause would be introduced, that is where the contract between landlord and tenant demands that where the tenant sells off his way-going crops he must put on manures in proportion to what he sells. It seems to me, as appears to the hon. and learned Gentleman, that it is extremely difficult to avoid one of the many difficulties that arise on this sub-section. Our object in amending this sub-section was to give to the tenant the right to which he is justly entitled, in whatever category of contract he comes, and to give to the landlord his just right also, but at the same time not to make it possible for the landlord to make use of a system of penal clauses which by another part of the Bill is abolished. It must be remembered that this sub-section applies only to the last two years of the tenancy, and during these years it has always been held that the landlord is entitled to have a tighter hold over the tenancy, as to the methods of cultivation, than is necessary during the preceding period. At the same time, it is not the desire of the Government that this should enable the re-enactment of the penal clauses. I gladly adopt the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman that if I find it possible to devise words which, while without in any way diminishing the value of what we believe would be the result of this sub-section, would prevent a revival of the old penal clause system, I shall be very glad on the part of the Government to adopt them.

MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): No one who has heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman can fail to feel that there is a most genuine desire on his part to meet the difficulty so very skilfully pointed out by my hon. and learned friend. The object is to give to the landlord his just right of not having the condition of the land let down during the last two years of the tenancy by selling off the way-going crops, and yet to leave the maximum of liberty in the hands of the tenant. Might I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the evil is introduced by the words "contract of tenancy"? It is not intended that, by any language in the contract of tenancy, we should get rid of those relations between landlord and tenant which are good for good husbandry. Might it not meet the difficulty if these words "contract of tenancy" were left out, and the clause made to read something in this way: "Shall be taken into account the value of the manure required by custom, or the requirements of good husbandry, to be returned to the holding in respect of any crop"? This would prevent the amount of manure which had to be put in during the last two years from being altered by any unreasonable requirements inserted in the contract of tenancy. I am perfectly satisfied that the object of the Government would not depend upon the fact that a grasping landlord would put in an unfair clause. The desire in all these restrictions on the tenant should only be to treat the landlord fairly.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS said he desired to accentuate the advice which had been so well expressed by his hon. friend on the opposite side of the House. The House would, no doubt, be aware that very great interest in this subject existed in Scotland, and that the Scottish Board of Agriculture had carefully considered the question, and considered that a change was desirable. The crux of the whole question was in the words "contract of tenancy." He made these remarks because he did not think that Scotch farming was quite understood in this country. The tenants did not exercise proper control over the terms of the lease, and it was because the tenants were not in the habit of exercising that control that a Bill of this kind was necessary. If the tenants were in a position to exercise that control this Bill ought not to be brought in, because it was an interference between the landlord and tenant in freedom of contract; but it was because freedom of contract was not possessed by the tenant, and because his interests were such as ought to be conserved, not only from the tenant's point of view, but from the national point of view, that the Amendment should be considered and incorporated in the law of the land. Under the possibilities of the present system of "contracts of tenancy" there was serious reason to believe that the compensation given by this Bill might not find its way into the pockets of tenants. The President of the Board of Agriculture no doubt was desirous to give effect to that which this Bill professed to do in this matter, and therefore, on behalf of Scottish agriculture, he wished to support the Amendment.

MR. HALDANE said, in consequence of the very satisfactory explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture, he should not trouble the House by going to a division, and therefore begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CHANNING said the words which he proposed to move by his first Amendment he understood were not acceptable to the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, and therefore he did not propose to move that Amendment. He proposed to move the second Amendment, the words of which followed line 27. The words that he proposed to move would form a continuation or an addition to the clause as it stood, and they had the warm appreciation of the Central Chamber of Agriculture and other agricultural bodies. It appeared to him there was very good reason for these words being added, but as he had not had the advantage of being present when the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture had replied to the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Haddingtonshire, he was not quite sure whether any explanation had been made which would cover the special point raised by his Amendment. His Amendment sought to re-insert the words which now stood in the original Sub-clause 6 of the English Agricultural Act of 1883, which secured to the tenant the right to be compensated for any manure which had been returned to the holding during his tenancy. It seemed to him that that point should be covered in a Bill of this description, because unless it was covered the clause as it at present stood might operate very unjustly to tenants of agricultural holdings in the immediate neighbourhood of large towns, where to all intents and purposes freedom of cultivation and sale of produce ought to be, as was in practice, given to the tenants of the holdings. The practice in many of these cases was to let out farms without any contracts at all. As the clause stood upon the Paper undoubtedly those contracts of agreement introduced in the lease of land in the neighbourhood of towns might operate a great injustice to those producing vegetables from their lands and making, as they might easily be able to make, ample manurial returns to the land. The words that he proposed to move had been strongly desired by the Chamber of Agriculture to be re-inserted in the clause. He was bound to say, from the consideration that he had given during the last few weeks to the immense amount of letters that he had received upon this particular question, that the Bill was nearer a settlement of this great question than any that they had had before. All he desired to do was to strengthen the Bill which had been introduced.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 27, after the word 'endured,' to insert the words 'except so far as a proper return of manure to the holding has been made in respect of such produce so sold off or removed, or security has been offered or given by the tenant that such proper and adequate return of manure to the holding will be made at the proper season.'"—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) hoped that the hon. Gentleman would not press the Amendment. The ground which he was desirous of covering had been already dealt with by what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture; besides which, he was not at all sure that if the words which the hon. Gentleman proposed were inserted they would have the effect which was intended. Of course, all the manure which had been returned to the land would be deducted, and therefore he hoped that the Amendment would not be pressed.

*MR. CHANNING: His only object was to secure that that right should be given to the tenant. After the explanation which had been given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. CHANNING said that the Amendment he now proposed to move raised a wholly different point. This was a subsection which he had hoped to move in somewhat different terms, upon the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Wigtownshire, who had advised that the clause should be drawn in the form of the clause which was passed in the Scottish Act of 1877, the Damage by Game Act of Scotland. That Act gave the tenant the right to claim compensation for the amount of damage by game in excess of the amount agreed upon between the landlord and the tenant in the contract of tenure; or where there was no agreement it provided that a certain specified sum should be paid in respect to the holding, and all damage that was proved to be done to the crops of the tenant by all kinds of game in excess of such amount should be allowed to the tenant. What is suggested here is that the tenant should be allowed during the last year of his tenure to claim and have such claim as was equitable and justifiable in the eye of the law allowed for all damage done by game to his crops. It was clearly desirable that this, like any other analogous claim, should be brought within the scope of the arbitration, and dealt with frankly and fairly for what it was worth at the time the arbitration was going on. They wanted to arrive at the most fair and amicable settlement between the parties as quickly as possible, and if the tenant could claim that damage had been done to his crops by game, it was desirable that that subject should be brought within the arbitration. The damage caused by game of all kinds was very considerable, and any claim for such damage ought to be fairly and fully dealt with. Those who had followed the course of events knew that just so far as depression had lowered agricultural rents there had been a corresponding extension of sporting tenancies, and an enormous head of game was often kept, and the sporting tenants were in some cases men who showed too little consideration for the farmers. From this there had resulted friction and loss to the farmers, which ought to be taken into consideration. There had been a certain number of cases brought to the attention of public men from time to time. There was an interesting case in South Oxfordshire, where there was an estate where the tenants wished to exercise their rights, and where there was an over-preservation of game. When the tenants wished to have their rights under the Ground Games Act they received notice to quit from the landlord. Other very similar cases had been reported, and this very serious grievance had been urgently pressed by many witnesses upon the attention of the Agricultural Commission during their sittings. The suggestion which he made was on the same principle and upon the same lines as the Act which was passed in 1877 for Scotland. It was couched in the most reasonable form, and if a settlement was to be arrived at in matters of this kind it could not be arrived at by a better method than by bringing those matters promptly and simply before the arbitrator who was to settle mutual claims between landlord and tenant.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 27, after the word 'endured,' to insert as a new sub-section the words, '(5) There shall be taken into account in augmentation of the tenant's compensation any sum which may be found by arbitration under this Act to be due to the tenant in respect of damage to crops by winged or ground game or deer during the last year of the tenancy.'"—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*Mr. LONG said that the Amendment moved by the hon. Member proposed to give the tenants a claim for compensation for damage done by game which he could assert against the landlord. and so far they were on solid ground, but the hon. Gentleman assumed that the landlord was the person responsible for any damage done by game, and upon his shoulders it was proposed to throw the liability for damage caused by game over which he had no sort of control whatever. It was extremely unfair to him. Take the case of a small landlord who had no game. His tenants were to have a claim for damage done by game belonging to some large landowner in the immediate neighbourhood which came over and damaged his crops. He admitted that there were these scandals with regard to game, and they were one of the difficulties which the House of Commons had to meet in dealing with this question. In certain cases there no doubt was an over-preservation of game, and in certain cases there was damage done by winged game, but the greatest damage which was done was done by the rabbits, and as a rule the tenant had no difficulty in getting compensation for the damage which the rabbits had done. With winged game it was a different thing altogether. There might be damage, but if there were he was of opinion that the liability for compensation should not rest upon the owner of the land, but the owner of the game.

*MR. WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross) wished to enter a protest against the way in which this Amendment had been resisted. Any person who had lived in the south-west of Scotland, with which he was intimately acquainted, knew perfectly well that the way in which to keep grouse on the moorland was by improving the moorland and taking a crop of oats off it, which prevented the grouse leaving the moorland and committing depredations on the lowland agricultural farms. What the tenant farmer did complain of was not so much of grouse, still less of partridges, but the enormous over-preservation of pheasants, which damaged the crops to a large extent, and for which, in his opinion, the landlord or his shooting tenant ought to pay compensation. The shooting rents had gone up, whilst agricultural rents had gone down. When the 12th of August approached people went mad to see how many grouse they could shoot. He was as fond of sport as anyone, but he thought it was carried to excess; and wealthy South Africans or Americans did little good to the community by the over-preservation of game, and giving employment for a few months during the shooting season to a few men. The principle should be adopted of giving the tenant farmer the absolute right to all game found upon the land. It that were done there would be more sport, better sport, and more game in the country than at present. The sporting tenant and the tenant farmer used to be absolutely and entirely distinct, but he was glad to say he now knew of many tenant farmers who had the shooting on their farms for which they were willing to pay, and he ventured to think that better shooting and better sport was never found in the country than when the tenant farmer had the same right to the winged game as he had to the ground game at the present time.

MR. HEDDERWICK ventured to suggest that his hon. friend the mover of the Amendment would be well advised if he withdrew it, and if the object which he had in view was desirable he should re-draft his Amendment. As he understood, the hon. Gentleman was desirous of placing upon the landlord the responsibility for the damage done to the crops by deer, winged and other game of various sorts, and that was upon the assumption that the game emanated from the ground of the landlord. But as the Amendment was drawn there was no security that the landlord's game would be held responsible for the damage done. A few years ago there was a suggestion made by an hon. Member of this House that all food coming from abroad should be labelled with the name of the place from which it had been produced. That proposal was not taken seriously in the House, because it was conceded that it would be a difficult thing to label every strawberry that came from France or the Netherlands. But if that was difficult to do, it was more difficult, in his opinion, to label every winged bird in the country, and he did not suppose that his hon. friend would obtain the object which he had in view by the Amendment, as it was impossible to put the responsibility upon the proper shoulders. This Amendment would make the landlord responsible for devastation done to crops, not by the game of the landlord at all, but by the game of an adjoining landowner who had over-preserved. He did not think those who proposed to support the Amendment seriously intended that the burden should be placed upon the wrong shoulders for the damage done by other people's game.

*CAPTAIN PRETYMAN said that the tenant had under the Ground Game Act an inalienable right to the rabbits, and therefore the effect of the Amendment would be that the tenant would be compensated by his landlord for damage done to his crops by his own rabbits.

MR. BUCHANAN hoped that his hon. friend would adhere to his Amendment as it stood, because looking at the matter in a broad light, the tenant who went before a Court for compensation for damage done to his crops had a right to claim for damage done by game of any sort. The Amendment limited the claim for damage done by game to the last year of the tenancy, which was a very considerable limitation. Everyone knew that deer did a very great deal of damage to growing crops of the tenants of Scotland, and he ventured to think that this was an Amendment that ought to find a place in the Bill.

*Mr. MOULTON : I seriously hope that this Amendment will not be persisted in, for a more ridiculous suggestion could not be made. Just consider. We all of us feel that it is a very hard thing for a tenant farmer that his crops should be destroyed because his neighbours will not keep their birds and rabbits and other game to themselves, and any attempt to remedy that injustice I shall certainly support. But consider what this proposition means. The proposition is that in the last year of the tenancy the tenant can make his landlord pay for damage done by his neighbour's game. The greater part of the damage is done by game which the tenant has a right to shoot down and ought to shoot down, and the remainder is done by game which is preserved by somebody, but the landlord may have nothing to do with it. I can understand some men feeling so indignant at the tenant farmer being compelled to suffer from damage done by game as to come to the conclusion that the landlord should compensate him, and seek his remedy against the neighbours who are guilty of preserving the game. But if you are going to introduce a system of that kind, why confine it to the last year of the tenancy? Why not make it perpetual? There is no reasonable ground for saying that in the last year of the tenancy the landlord shall compensate the tenant for damage he has no connection with. Do not let us try to get from the Government consideration for Amendments like this. They can have no other meaning than a protest against the game laws. This session to-night is a practical one. We are trying to make the best of the Bill, but do not let us press to a division an Amendment which we do not feel is worthy of being put upon the English Statute Book.

Mr. Buchanan.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) supported the Amendment, and said that in the vicinity of the deer forests of Scotland the deer got into the crops of the tenant farmers and of the crofters and did an enormous amount of damage. If the crofters had the power to shoot the deer he could understand the principle of their not asking for compensation, but since they were debarred from the power of shooting the brutes, why should not the owner of the deer pay a fair compensation for the damage that the deer had done? He had heard it said that the tenants should put up fences in order to keep the game out, but in the case of deer they would require to put up fences of seven or eight feet high; and if that were done, why should not the landlord pay for the fences? He was sorry to have to refer again to the want of knowledge possessed by the right hon. Gentleman who was in charge of the Bill. It was a great pity that he ventured to deal with subjects of which he had little or no knowledge. Why did not the hon. Gentleman make it his business to know that this Act applied to Scotland as well as England? The destruction caused by deer was simply enormous, and was it to be said that before a man could claim compensation he was to find out who was the owner of the deer? It was the business of the owner of the ground upon which the deer were found to find that out. He should be made responsible to the tenant, or else the tenant should be given the power to shoot these brutes who devastated their crops.

Captain SINCLAIR (Forfarshire) said a great deal of ridicule had been cast upon the Amendment, but no argument had been advanced and no objection had been raised to the principle involved. Anything more misleading than the remarks of the hon. Member for Launceston could hardly be imagined. The only objection which had been raised by every speaker against the Amendment was that the tenant would obtain compensation from his landlord for damage caused by the game of somebody else, from whom he could not claim compensation. In nineteen cases out of twenty the objection was an artificial one, and in the twentieth case the rights of the landlord were perfectly safeguarded by the court of arbitration which would have to adjust the claims made under this Bill. The drafting of the Amendment might not be so good as it should be, still it embodied the fair principle that those who had the sporting rights should pay for them. He supported the Amendment with great pleasure.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE thought that those who supported the Amendment had not carefully considered where it was likely to lead to. If the tenant was to be compensated for damage done by game during the last year of the tenancy, why should he not be compensated for the hounds crossing his land and tearing down the fences during the same period, and for damage done by rooks and pigeons and small birds which come out from the towns in the autumn? What was to be the compensation for the damage done by beasts of the field, fowls of the air, and reptiles, from wherever they might come, and other agencies? The landlord was to be responsible for damage which he could not control; why should not the tenant be compensated for the damage done by the ground game, which he could destroy if he liked?

MR. WEIR: What about deer?

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE: The tenant was to be compensated for damage done by game not belonging to his landlord and over which he had no control. There was no knowing what this Amendment would lead to, and he could not support it.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) asked whether the onus of erecting an eight-foot fence around his land to protect it from the devastation of deer was to be placed upon the tenant. He thought it was the duty of the landlord who owned the deer for his own pleasure to undertake such an expense as that. It was the duty of the landlord to enclose the farm or keep the deer within the bounds of the deer forest, and if he did not the tenant farmer had a right to shoot all that came on his land, even in the face of the law, to protect himself. These deer could wander from the park into the cornfields and eat all the corn or other produce, and it was a great injustice to say that the farmer should not kill them. He strongly supported the Amendment.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) pointed out that a case arose in the county of Cork a few weeks previously, in which a farmer alleged that great depredations had been committed on his land by rabbits, and that he was entitled to a very large reduction in his rent in consequence, but because he could not prove that the rabbits came from a particular warren, which he alleged that they had come from, he did not get the reduction which he was legitimately entitled to. The small farmer had great difficulty in protecting his land from ground game. One of the most trying things to a farmer living in the neighbourhood of a rabbit warren was to protect his crops at all, and the onus of protecting them should be thrown on the landlord, and if the tenant could prove that the depredations were caused by the neglect of the landlord, he should be entitled to compensation. A considerable number of Irish landlords made a large income from their rabbits which caused these serious depredations, and every reasonable precaution should be taken by the landlords to keep their game in their enclosures. The onus should not be thrown on the farmer. He cordially supported the Amendment.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid) said that when a question with regard to game came up for discussion every person in the House thought they were qualified to speak upon it. He strongly objected to the supposed prior right of the land lord to the game which came on the land of the tenant. Pheasants were bred like hens, and when they got fat, hon. Gentlemen went down from town and took a pleasure in shooting them and called it sport. The tenant farmer was prevented from having a "go" at the game, simply because he was a tenant farmer and not an aristocrat. They did these things somewhat better in Ireland, as there they took the law into their own hands, and long might they do so. As to rabbits, a personal friend of his had a large number, and they were getting into the country and committing depredations——

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not addressing himself to the Amendment before the House.

Dr. TANNER explained that he was only pointing out that the rabbits committed such depredations that his friend had to get trappers in to trap the rabbits.

*Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to address himself to the Amendment.

Dr. TANNER contended that in such cases as those to which the Amendment referred, the tenant ought to get compensation, and where wrong was done on a poor man's land the poor man ought to have the right to shoot the game, no matter of what description it might be.

Question put.

Sir William Walrond and
Mr. Anstruther.

LORD HUGH CECIL, in moving to omit Clause 2, stated that the Amendment was really put down to give the President of the Board of Agriculture an opportunity of explaining the bearing of the clause, and especially of the first sub-section, about the meaning of which there had been a difference of opinion expressed. The words "agreement, custom, or otherwise" seemed to be rather wide, and there was also an uncertainty as to what would happen if the arbitration provisions in the agreement were ill-made and not satisfactory. In such a case the proceedings would be in part under the Bill and in part under the agreement, and some confusion might arise. But the principal matter was as to the distinct bearing of the words "any improvement." There had been discussion on this point, and some Members appeared to think the words implied a procedure under which the landlord and tenant would endeavour to arrange their differences, and when they came to any particular improvement as to which they could not agree that particular question would be submitted to arbitration, and a separate award given. Another view, which he believed was the correct one, was that the more common proceeding would be to present the whole case to the arbitrator, who would make one award in a lump sum, and not review in detail all the points put before him. The point was one to be discussed on the schedule rather than on the clause, but it was desirable it should be made plain which was the correct view. It was worth noticing that the fourth sub-section contemplated a separate award in special cases, and that went to show that the ordinary procedure would be that of awarding a lump sum covering the whole case.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 5, to leave out Clause 2."—(Lord Hugh Cecil.)

Question proposed, "That the words of the clause to the first word 'and,' in line 8, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG explained that the object of putting in the words referred to was simply to secure to the tenant that where he had a claim to compensation arising under the present Bill or the principal Act, or under custom, and so on, that right should be reserved to him. As to the second point raised, as to the procedure in the event of the arbitration provisions in the agreement not being satisfactory, it was quite clear that in such a case recourse would be had to the arbitration procedure provided in the Bill, which became operative in the event of the parties not providing the necessary machinery. In reference to whether the award would be given as a whole or in regard to separate parts, as a rule it would probably be given as a whole. But supposing the landlord and tenant agreed upon several points and disagreed only upon one or two, the arbitrator's award would then be upon the one or two points upon which there was a difference of opinion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUCHANAN said the next Amendment was put down for a similar reason to the last, namely, to get an interpretation of the meaning of the words referred to.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 8, to leave out the words from the word 'Act' to the word 'the,' in line 10."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the words were not surplusage. Their object was to provide an opportunity for the parties to agree. If they agreed there was no necessity for arbitration; if they failed to agree on one or two points, those one or two points would be referred to arbitration. As to the assistance of valuers or others, that was a matter entirely for the parties concerned. If the words were omitted it would seem to indicate that arbitration should be resorted to at once without the parties attempting to come to terms. He therefore hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

*MR. CHANNING thought the Amendment was put down under an impression as to the nature of the existing Act which was not absolutely well founded. The point at which objection should be taken to the procedure of the clause was not at this point but later on. The words as they stood were unobjectionable, but they certainly ought to move to omit the words which immediately followed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill, as amended (by the Standing Committee), to be further considered tomorrow.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Debate arising:—

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This Bill is a very important Bill, and I strongly object to it being taken at a time when it cannot be properly discussed. I therefore beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dillon.)

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) explained that the measure was a formal annual Bill, the provisions of which followed on the lines of its predecessors, and were not controversial.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I think the House ought to have from the Secretary to the Treasury some explanation with reference to this Bill, because in addition to the nomination of the Commissioners it is proposed to write off a certain amount of money in connection with loans lent under Acts of Parliament. In Part II. it is proposed to write off about £2,700 for one man, and in Part I. it is proposed to write off about £1,500. It is very unfair that such an important measure should be moved so near twelve o'clock, and if the Treasury are going to write off about £4,500 of loans due to them it is a very serious matter——

It being midnight, the motion for the adjournment of the debate lapsed without Question put, and the debate on the Second Reading stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I propose to take the Second Reading of the Public Works Loans Bill as first Order to-morrow, as I am informed the money is urgently required. Though it is not strictly in order, I may say at the same time that I understand it will be extremely inconvenient to a large number of Members to sit later than 4 o'clock in the afternoon. I propose to adjourn the discussion on the Agricultural Holdings Bill, which will be the second Order, at that hour, and for the remainder of the day only non-controversial business will be taken.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: What Bill does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take after 4 o'clock?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Post Office Sites Bill and the Larceny Bill.

An HON. MEMBER asked whether the Post Office Sites Bill and the Larceny Bill were the only Government measures to be taken after 4 o'clock on Wednesday.

MR. DILLON asked whether it had been decided to take the Tithe Rentcharge (Ireland) Bill, Third Reading, as first Order on Thursday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible for me to answer with certainty the last question, as I do not know what progress we shall make with the Agricultural Holdings Bill to-morrow. I quite agree it would not be fair to take the Third Reading of the Tithes Bill at a late hour of the evening; it ought to be either first Order or very near it, and I will endeavour to give the hon. Member an answer to-morrow. I am not anxious to press on Government business to-morrow after the two measures I have mentioned, but it is distinctly understood that the time we give up is not to be taken by private Members for their Bills. If after passing the Bills I have named the House prefers to adjourn I shall raise no objection, but if they do not adjourn Government and not private business will be taken.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would be able to state to-morrow when the Irish Estimates and the Education Bill would be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To-morrow or Thursday—at any rate, I will take an early opportunity.

Adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve of the clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. G. J. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) said that, unfortunately, the Navy Estimates would not be able to be taken on Friday next, as the Memorandum which had been promised would not be ready. The Home Office and Local Government Board Votes would therefore be taken on that day, and the Leader of the House would put down the Navy Estimates at the earliest possible date.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said that on the previous night the First Lord of the Treasury had stated that this Bill was of an urgent nature, but for the life of him he could not understand in what way its urgency was such as to justify its being put in front of the Agricultural Holdings Bill. It was a measure usually brought in towards the end of the session, and, indeed, usually ran along with the Appropriation Bill. The Government might have reasons of their own for wishing to press the Bill on, but certainly the reasons had nothing to do with the Bill itself. The present Bill differed from previous Bills in that it nominated the Public Works Loan Commissioners, who held office for five years. The list was practically the same as before; it containing only two changes, the new Commissioners being Horace Alfred Damer Seymour and Colonel Lockwood. Why should an English Member, Colonel Lockwood, be put in the place of a Scotch representative, Lord Napier? He should also like to be informed what duties these Commissioners performed. How often did they meet? For all the House knew, they never met at all. As Parliament was here asked to reappoint certain people for a further five years, some information should be given as to their attendances in the past. Another point upon which the House was entitled to information was as to the extent Parliament exercised any effective control over the giving out of these moneys. This was a most important Department, as it was necessary to see that the security was good when a loan was advanced, as otherwise large amounts of money had to be written off. This should be a real business Department, and the House wanted to know that these names were not merely ornamental, but that the men were giving their attention to the work in a business-like way. With regard to the sums to be written off also this was a most important Bill. If such a Bill was brought forward and allowed to pass without discussion, what would be the result? The Department lending the money would find they had nothing more to do than to put a schedule to a Bill, and the Secretary to the Treasury would get it slipped through the House after midnight without discussion, with the result that the Commissioners would find it an extremely simple thing to write off debts that were a little troublesome to them. No explanation whatever was given why these amounts were to be written off; the House was simply asked to agree, and at five minutes to twelve an attempt was made to rush the Bill through. He would not take each of the items, but there was one in regard to which certainly some explanation should be given. Under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1885, a man named Fitzgerald got a loan of £3,000 from the Irish Land Commission. The amount repaid was only £200 9s. 10d., and the House was now asked to remit £2,799 10s. 2d. That was a big order, especially without a single word of explanation. Other sums proportionately heavy were also to be written off. There was a man named Lambert who borrowed £500, repaid £182 0s. 10d., and the House was asked to write off £317 19s. 2d. Again no explanation was given, and the Commissioners were given the idea that they could put anything they liked in these schedules, that there would be no supervision, and that nobody would call them into question. Public money should not be allowed to be written off in that way. The Department should feel that there was a supervision exercised, and that the Government might be challenged with regard to any particular case. The total effect of Part 1 of the schedule was that loans had been granted to the extent of £2,171 0s. 7d., of which only £541 17s. 8d. had been repaid, and the House was asked to write off £1,512 17s. 10d. It was no wonder borrowers in Ireland did not pay the money. He would be perfectly astonished if it were otherwise, when such lists could be seen year by year, showing that borrowers could get the whole or two-thirds and so on written off. There was one case in connection with the Fishery Board for Scotland. The sum advanced was £114; the amount repaid and realised by sale of the boat was £90 7s. 6d.; all that was asked to be written off was £23 12s. 6d. Loans for fishing boats were always precarious, as a storm might arise and the boats be lost or the men drowned; but, notwithstanding that, there was only this one case of £23 12s. 6d., and five men were concerned in that. Therefore, so far as Scotland was concerned, there was nothing unreasonable in the loans; but what was to be thought of a case in which only £200 was repaid out of £3,000? It was not in the interest of the Treasury that this writing off of loans should be allowed to pass perfunctorily through the House, and he intended that it should not. He warned the Secretary to the Treasury that when the Bill got into Committee an explanation would be required of each individual item, and every one of the items should be thoroughly probed to the bottom, so the right hon. Gentleman could get his material ready. Owing to the circumstances under which the Bill was put forward on the previous evening the hon. Member for East Mayo had lost his right to speak on the Second Reading, and in order to restore to the hon. Member his right to speak he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This is not the first time I have directed attention to the form of this Bill, and the point to which I desire specially to direct attention is the practice of putting into the schedule long lists of arrears which are to be written off without any item of information being given as to the character of the arrears or as to the reasons for writing them off. There are many cases in which unanswerable reasons exist for writing off the amounts, but we do not know which are those cases. There is a new principle introduced in the second part of the schedule. The practice in previous Bills has been to put in a list of the items to be written off, but wherever those items were large in amount they were always loans to public authorities. Where there were arrears to be written off in the case of private individuals they were always either of extremely long standing or small in amount. The first item in the schedule is that of Giles Eyre Lambert, who obtained £500, and is to have £317 19s. 2d. written off. The period of that loan is 1847, and one might naturally conclude the time had come when that should be written off as a bad debt. But you have here the case of a gentleman named Fitzgerald, who borrowed under the Purchase Act of 1885 the sum of £3,000. He could borrow under that Act for no other purpose than that of buying a large valuable holding which the inspectors of the Land Commission must have certified as being ample and good security for the loan. Now, at the end of fifteen years, we are asked to forgive this gentleman £2,799.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken. We do not forgive the debt; we simply write it off as an asset of the Local Loans Fund; the debt is still recoverable.

MR. DILLON: That, indeed, is a new and extraordinary principle. What is the hurry for writing off Mr. Fitzgerald's debt? I really think after that answer we are entitled to some explanation. We want to know why a man who has borrowed so large a sum on presumably excellent security at so recent a date is to have this amount written off. This is an enormously important question, because millions have been lent on precisely this sort of security, and the process is going on at the rate of about £2,000,000 a year. If this debt is recoverable and there is a prospect of getting it, why should it be written off? What has become of the holding? By the terms of the Act of 1885 the holding must have been worth much more than the amount advanced. The principle of the Act is that there must be a margin, and £3,000, according to the principle of the Act, ought not to have been lent on a holding worth less than about £5,000 to the tenant. We are therefore entitled to assume that the loan is secure, and we want a full explanation of this matter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): The question raised is a most important one, and the case referred to by the hon. Member for East Mayo is one of the most extraordinary I have ever seen. First of all, there is a sum of £3,000 advanced, there is only £200 repaid, and we are asked to write off the remainder. Surely we are entitled to have some explanation of such a transaction. If we assume that not more than two-thirds of the value of the security would be advanced, that means that the holding would be worth about £4,000. It is now discovered that owing to over-valuation or some other reason that £3,000 is represented by no asset at all; and although the amount may be recoverable as a personal debt, the Treasury have come to the conclusion that it is no good, and it is to be practically, though not nominally, wiped out in this way. There ought to be some explanation. We should not be called upon year by year to get up and say, "Can you explain the case of James Collins or Michael O'Brien?" The House of Commons does not lend itself to that sort of thing. There ought to be a report sent to the House of Commons every year before the Bill is read a second time, each individual transaction being explained, and if any explanation was not satisfactory we could bring it up when the Bill was considered. The possibility is that these things will go on increasing, and there is a great deal in the point as to the change in the character of the debt we are asked to wipe off. Up to the present we have been asked to wipe off debts for public works, by which we may assume some good has been done, even though the locality may not be rich enough to repay the sum advanced by the Treasury. But here we are asked to wipe out debts incurred in the interests of private individuals in different parts of the kingdom. That, I think, makes it all the more necessary that a report should be made in regard to this matter. There is one local point to which I desire to call attention. I find amongst the Commissioners every part of the United Kingdom represented except Wales. I think the right hon. Gentleman might consent to Wales also being represented on this Board. When the matter was brought forward on a previous occasion the objection was that the number of Commissioners was limited. But this is an Act of Parliament, it is not merely an administrative Act, and if the right hon. Gentleman consents he can easily increase the number of Commissioners by one. There is not one of the present Commissioners to whom I object, but certainly there should be one representative of the Principality, one very good reason being that there is not a part of the country which receives less from the Local Loans Fund than the Principality of Wales; and I am sure there is no part of the country which deserves more from the fund. A great deal could be done to restore the fishing industry in that part of the country, and that is a very important industry from an Imperial point of view. The Navy used to draw some of its best men from that part of the country in the past, but it does nothing of the kind at present. The industry is dying out, and we have constantly asked the Treasury to assist us by loan or by grant to develop the fishing industry, but without success. Wales ought to have one representative at least to see that fair play is done to that part of the coast, and I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury will not consent to increase the number by one, and that one to be a Welsh Member—it does not matter from which side of the House he comes.

MR. HANBURY: The hon. Member for Carnarvon has made two suggestions, and I quite agree with what he said in regard to each of them. He first suggested that the House should have more information with regard to the debts that are written off, and an explanation of the reasons for taking that course. That is a very reasonable suggestion, and I will undertake that in future there shall be laid before the House, if possible before the Bill is brought on for Second Reading, a complete statement showing our position with regard to the various items. The hon. Member also asked me with reference to the appointment of a distinctly Welsh Commissioner. Although the number of Commissioners is not actually limited, as a matter of fact it has always been exactly the same, about sixteen, I think. I am told there would be some objection to increasing that number; but I have been in communication with the Commissioners, who are to a great extent in sympathy with the suggestion of the hon. Member, and I have every reason to believe that should a vacancy occur they would be very glad to consider the suggestion he has made—that a Commissioner representing Wales should be placed upon the list. As the hon. Member knows, the names come before Parliament only once every five years, but any vacancies which occur during that period are filled by the Commissioners themselves. Therefore, their agreement that a Welsh member might very well be appointed is one which they will probably have an opportunity of carrying into effect. The hon. Member for Mid Lanark is, I think, a little unreasonable. He complains, first, that we brought on the Bill at five minutes to twelve at night; and then he complains that we set it down as first Order for to-day. It is, therefore, a little difficult to see what would satisfy him, but I will do my best to facilitate matters by giving an answer to the points he has raised. He asks, in the first place, where is the urgency for this Bill. The hon. Member takes a considerable interest in the needs of various localities, and he must know that we are constantly receiving applications from local authorities for loans; but as the powers of last year are exhausted, those loans cannot be granted until this Bill is passed. It is, therefore, in the interest not so much of the Treasury as of the local authorities that we are pressing this Bill. The hon. Gentleman then raised several points which are really Committee points rather than matters to be discussed on the Second Reading, and as he has promised to call my attention to a great many of these points in Committee, perhaps I ought to give him the opportunity to raise them twice over. There is, however, one important case, but it is not one of remission. There seems to be an idea on the part of the hon. Member for East Mayo, and even on the part of such a financier as the hon. Gentleman opposite, that we are actually wiping off these debts. We are doing nothing of the kind; we are simply writing them off as assets of the Local Loans Fund. That does not by any means mean that they are not recoverable, or that we shall not do our best to recover them. As matter of fact, within the last ten years a large number of these loans which have been written off as assets of the Local Loans Fund have been recovered and paid into the Exchequer.

MR. DILLON: To what amount?

MR. HANBURY: I think between £12,000 and £15,000 during the last ten years.

MR. DILLON: And how much was remitted during that period?

MR. HANBURY: I really cannot carry all these figures in my head. I ought to mention the particular case of Fitzgerald, which has been referred to. It is not a recent loan at all; it was considerably before 1889 when he fell into arrear with his annual payments. What has happened is this. We could find no purchaser of the land for several years, and now it has been leased by the Land Commission for a period of twenty years at £58 a year, which, I am told, is the full letting value of the land. That being so, is it fair to the Local Loans Fund, or the local authorities who desire to borrow from that fund, that that money should be lying idle? It is, therefore, being wiped off the assets of the fund; but we have the security, and meanwhile are getting the rent. Directly the farm can be sold, the whole of the proceeds will be paid into the Exchequer. This is distinctly a case where we have every prospect of recovering, at any rate, a large portion of the loan. The only other point raised by the hon. Member was the complaint that there were more Irish than Scotch loans remitted. I should have thought that was rather complimentary than otherwise to his country, but he seemed bitterly to complain that Scotchmen did not borrow money and then find themselves unable to repay it. I really cannot enter into the frame of mind of the hon. Member. I think Scotland is to be congratulated on the fact that it does pay up its debts.

MR. CALDWELL: Make Ireland pay up also.

MR. HANBURY: We do our best to make Ireland pay up. If the hon. Member wishes us to be even more hard than we are upon Irish borrowers, I must confess I do not take so hard a view of the case as he does. But when he supposes we are remitting these loans, we are doing nothing of the sort; and with regard to a large number, we are recovering certain amounts of the sums so written off.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorganshire, E.): While I very much appreciate the tone in which the right hon. Gentleman has replied to the hon. Member for Carnarvon, I must say that no argument has been advanced why the number of Commissioners should be confined to sixteen. We are not very anxious to wait for dead men's shoes; moreover, we want a representative appointed by the House of Commons, and there is no reason whatever why Wales should not have one representative on the Board.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I feel under an obligation to hon. Members for directing attention to this Bill. I have watched these Public Works Loans Bills and Bills of a kindred character, and I have discovered that year after year there are debts written off without any explanation whatever or cause shown. I have long thought it a very unsatisfactory condition of affairs, and I rejoice to hear the statement just made by my right hon. friend that that system should come to an end. I certainly think it would be in the public interest that debts should not be written off so long as they may fairly be regarded as recoverable. The wiping off of a debt of this kind shows a certain amount of carelessness in the advance, and that carelessness ought to be, I will not say rebuked, but carefully watched by the House of Commons. I am sure that although we have important business before us the time has not been wasted in this short discussion of a question which, in principle if not in figures, is one of very great importance.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): It is very essential that when accounts are written off in this way some explanation should be given. In municipal life every precaution is taken before accounts are written off, and the same should be done with regard to a Government Department. It was, therefore, an extraordinary piece of policy on the part of the Government to move this Bill at five minutes to twelve last night when such large amounts of money are involved. I quite agree that it is very unfair that Wales should be excluded from having a Commissioner, because when loans are applied for by a local authority the local knowledge of any particular Commissioner must always carry great weight with the other Commissioners. Wales is therefore entitled to have a representative, and I hope that in Committee the hon. Member for Canarvon will move the addition of a gentleman from Wales. The point I wish particularly to raise is, that the Secretary to the Treasury has not fully explained the mode of writing off these accounts. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a probability of the amounts being recovered hereafter. This Bill, like all other Bills of the Government, requires reference to two or three other Acts of Parliament before it can be understood, and Section 3 of the Bill refers to Section 15 of the principal Act of 1887. There I find that the mode of preventing loss to the Exchequer is a most extraordinary one, and one which is very unfair upon those local authorities and private individuals who do pay their debts to the Exchequer. In Section 11 it states that there was a sum estimated at £12,000,000, or thereabouts, which had been lost to the Exchequer through the non-payment by local authorities and individuals of the principal of local loans. How are these losses met? They are met by a restitution fund. Under Sub-section 1 of Section 11 of the Act of 1887 the Local Loans Fund has to set aside every year £130,000 in quarterly instalments, to be paid to the credit of the National Debt Commissioners, to prevent the National Debt Commissioners suffering any loss by the non-repayment of these loans. This is very unfair to the local authorities who do pay their debts, because if the Local Loans Fund can afford to set aside £130,000 a year, these sums ought to be enforced and the amount go towards the reduction of the interest charged to the local authorities.

I referred last night to the case which has been brought up to-day. I should like to know whether in the Report we are to have we shall be told how much this man Fitzgerald received more than he ought to have received on this farm. That is really the point.

MR. DILLON: Four times its value.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: The hon. Member for East Mayo says he had four times its value. If that is the case, I ask how is it possible for these tenant farmers who become the owners of their land under the Purchase Act to pay the interest and principal on that same land? In the schedule of loans by the Commissioners of Public Works, Ireland, there is a total amount advanced of £2,171, of which only £541 has been repaid, so that there is a loss, for the time being, to the Exchequer or the Local Loans Fund of £1,512. I think we are entitled to receive from the Chancellor of the Exchequer some information as to the state of this restitution fund, and whether the amount is equal to meeting the losses which the National Debt Commissioners are bound to suffer under this system. In any case, we were justified in opposing this Bill last night and to-day, and if the hon. Member goes to a division I shall go into the Lobby with him as a protest against the action of the Government in bringing this matter forward in the manner they have.

MR. GODDARD (Ipswich): In his incomplete explanation of the Bill, the Secretary to the Treasury has spoilt his own arguments altogether. The right hon. Gentleman said the Treasury were now receiving from the estate to which reference has been made a rent of a little under £60 a year. If, however, £60 a year is the full value of the farm, how in the name of reason came a loan of £3,000 to be advanced upon it? That is about fifty years purchase; so that, on the face of it, either the right hon. Gentleman's explanation is incomplete, or it is proved that very great rashness was shown in advancing the money. I hope some further explanation will be given on this point, because if that is the way in which these loans are made it is very clear there will have to be a great many of these cases in the future in which amounts will have to be written off. I strongly support the contention that Wales should have a representative on the Commission. The right hon. Gentleman has given a sort of promise with regard to the matter, but it would be much more satisfactory to the Welsh Members if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to add the name of a Welsh Commissioner at once instead of waiting until such time as a vacancy occurs.

SIR DILLWYN LLEWELYN (Swansea Town): I rise to support the appeal made by the hon. Member for Carnarvon. At the present moment it is most desirable that some special attention should be paid to the claims of Wales, and that there should be on the Commission some gentleman who thoroughly understands the needs of the Principality. Quite recently the county of Monmouth has been called upon to find its own lunatic asylum, and the counties linked with it in the past—Brecon and Radnor—have had to provide similar institutions for themselves. They have made application to the Public Works Loans Board for a grant of money for this purpose, and, although it has been allowed in the case of Brecon, it has been refused in the case of Radnorshire. I hope the decision is not a final one, because I think that when two counties similarly situated make such an application they should be treated as nearly equally as possible, and equitably as well. I am not going to make any complaint as to the rate of interest claimed by the Public Works Loans Board, because I am perfectly well aware that that rate has recently been raised, but I do ask that the claims of Radnorshire should be considered by that Board and by the Treasury; and I may add that there is a feeling that, hitherto, they have not been acceded to simply because Wales has no direct representative on the Board.

MR. PHILIPPS (Pembrokeshire): I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will speak on this matter, and will promise that the very reasonable demands put forward by some of my colleagues from Wales shall be conceded. The hon. Member who has just spoken has pointed out that certain Welsh demands had been refused. Perhaps the refusal has been just; but I think Wales can scarcely be expected to consider that its claims are fairly listened to when it is realised that of the sixteen Commissioners not one has any connection with the Principality. I understand that the only reason given by the Secretary to the Treasury for not appointing a Welsh Commissioner is that the body of Commissioners has always consisted of sixteen members. But sixteen is not a mystic number; it is no better than any other number; and I do not think that it is fair that the Government should put us in the position of having on another stage of this Bill to object in turn to each of the gentlemen nominated. We have no wish to prolong this debate, and we are perfectly ready to let the Bill go through at once if the right hon. Gentleman will give us a pledge that he will either get one of the gentlemen nominated to withdraw in the interests of someone from Wales, or that he will add another member to the Board. Considering the fact that the Commissioners have at their disposal a sum of six millions sterling from England and Scotland, and of eight hundred thousand pounds from Ireland, I do think the right hon. Gentleman might make the concession for which we are asking.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The House must remember that these Commissioners are unpaid, and I think that both the House and the country are deeply indebted to them for the important work they perform. I entirely agree with what has fallen from the Members for Wales that there ought to be among the Commissioners one who is acquainted with that part of the United Kingdom, and I will see them on the subject before the Bill reaches the Committee stage, with a view to their appointing someone. The hon. Member for Stockton is entirely mistaken with regard to the restitution fund. The hon. Member objected to that fund on the ground that it is unfair to make existing and new borrowers pay old debts. In 1897 the same view occurred to me, and at my instance Parliament abolished the restitution fund altogether, making provision for the application of the surplus income of the Local Loans Fund so as to provide against default. Every year the accounts of the Local Loans Fund are presented to Parliament, and I think they show that the result has been by no means unsatisfactory.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) said he thought the House was entitled to much more information than was given in the schedule of this Bill. It was a remarkable fact that absolutely no information was forthcoming with regard to Irish loans beyond the mere name of the borrower. In the case of Scotch loans they were told the district in which the loan was granted, and he ventured to assert that they ought to have in all cases full information as to the circumstances under which the money was advanced. Now, with regard to the case of Mr. Fitzgerald——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I would remind the hon. Member that these minute details are more profitably discussed in Committee, and not on the motion for the Second Reading.

MR. FLAVIN said his object in mentioning them was to enable the Minister in charge of the Bill to obtain the necessary information by the time the Committee stage was reached. He thought he was entitled to ask why a sum of £3,000 was advanced upon a farm the annual rent of which was £58.

MR. HANBURY: I will undertake that full information shall be laid before the House before the Committee stage is reached.

MR. FLAVIN said that, so far as he could see, this particular transaction must result in a loss of at least £2,000. The tenant got no advantage whatever from the money advanced. The landlord had pocketed it, and yet the tenant was liable to have proceedings taken against him and to be made a bankrupt. He hoped that in future, in regard to Irish loans at any rate, they would be informed not only of the amount of the loan but of the name of the borrower, and of the district in which he lived. Seeing that the right hon. Gentleman had promised to give that, he thought the best thing they could do was to conclude the discussion.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn,

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), further considered.

Clause 2:—

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) said he had to move the omission of the words requiring that the arbitration should, in the first place, be in accordance with any agreement between landlord and tenant, and in default of and subject to any such agreement in accordance with the provisions of the Act. He said that the effect of striking out these words would be that they would revert to the provisions of the existing Act as to procedure. The present Bill adopted the phraseology of Section 8 of the Act of 1883, in so far as the landlord and tenant were enabled to agree as to the amount, time, and mode of payment of compensation for any improvement. But it went on to add that if they did not so agree the difference should be settled by arbitration in accordance with provisions, if any, in that behalf in any agreement between landlord and tenant; but in default of, and subject to, any such provision, by arbitration under this Act, in accordance with the provisions set out in the second schedule of the Act. It would therefore be seen that another stage was introduced into these proceedings in this clause, in the form in which it now stood, and the tenant would be shut out from the arbitration procedure set forth in the schedule of the Bill. He did not himself think that there was anything in the wording of the Act to prevent a wholly unreasonable method of settling the differences between the two parties being set up by such an agreement as was indicated; neither could he trace any check to prevent the parties agreeing to appoint an arbitrator years beforehand to settle all questions which might arise between them. He had put down this Amendment in order that the House might know exactly what it was doing in passing this particular piece of legislation. It was most important it should be fully realised that, while the chief merit of the Bill was that it undoubtedly simplified the procedure for settling differences between the two parties by means of a single arbitrator, and thereby affording a clearer, cheaper, and shorter process, and one less calculated to lead to friction between the parties, yet having set up this admirable machinery, it was by these words proposed to place in the hands of the landlords and their agents an almost irresistible weapon which they could use if they wished, and if they were so arbitrarily inclined, to deprive the tenants of all the advantages they might derive from adopting the procedure laid down in this Act. He wished to remove one misconception which arose in a short discussion at the Council of the Central Chamber of Agriculture on the previous day on this question. He wished to make it plain that he did not in the least propose to interfere, nor would there be any interference if his Amendment were carried, with the reasonable power of contracting out as regarded settlements of claims for compensation for improvements, as already provided in the existing Act. That Act provided for a perfectly reasonable and most desirable exercise of freedom of contract between the parties in cases where a tenant was taking an improving lease of land. If his Amendment were carried the parties in such a case would still retain absolute freedom to agree on matters of that kind, provided, of course, that the agreement was reasonable and fair. What he objected to, however, was the power they were creating under this Bill of giving the landlord or his agent the right to set up their own particular form of arbitration, and to appoint their own particular arbitrator, and to say to the tenant, "You must accept your lease or agreement subject to our conditions." He ventured to say that it would cause profound disappointment to many farmers in this country if a provision of this kind were allowed to remain in the Bill. The whole object of this legislation was to supersede and clear away what was inoperative and unsatisfactory in the old Act. That Act had proved a source of friction and difficulty between the parties. This Bill, he repeated, had for its chief merit that it set up a cheaper, simpler, and clearer machinery, and a serious responsibility would lie upon the Government if it placed in the hands of the landlords power to contract themselves out from the use of that machinery. He thoroughly recognised the desirability of retaining Clause 5 of the old Act, which enabled the landlord and tenant to agree, either at the beginning or during the course of the tenancy, on the amount, time, and mode of payment of compensation for any improvement that might be claimed for. But he also made a strong claim for the maintenance of the most absolute freedom on the part of the tenant, where a dispute had arisen, to have recourse, at the close of his tenancy, if he saw fit, to the machinery which this Bill provided, and he submitted that the tenant ought not to be shut out from it by an agreement which might have been entered into years before, under circumstances and conditions in which he could not possibly contemplate the position he found himself placed in at the end of the tenancy. It seemed to him that this was the most undesirable course to adopt with regard to both new and old tenants. What would happen if the words were left in, in the case of tenants who had invested a large amount of capital in carrying out improvements upon their holdings, on the security of a tenancy from year to year? They had, of course, a large stake in the land, and if they wished to retain their holdings they would, in many cases, be placed in the position of having to choose between signing an agreement of this kind and surrendering their farms. He had heard that already agreements were being entered into which excluded tenants from the benefits of this Bill. He ventured to say that a tenant in such a position would have a very inadequate power to resist the imposition upon him of a course of procedure which might be very prejudicial to his interests. It might very probably be objected to this Amendment that by Section 55 of the Act of 1883 it was provided that the rights of the tenant should not be contracted out. But he would draw attention to the fact that that section only protected the rights of the tenant as regarded the claiming of compensation in respect of any improvement, and it did not protect in any way the right of the tenant to take advantage of the procedure under the Act. He was well aware it might be contended that they were now trying to amalgamate and bring together all claims that might arise under agreements and custom under the provisions of the Act. That was eminently desirable, and those who had followed cases in the courts of law know perfectly well that great hardship and injustice had been caused by inability to enforce claims by reason of the undue limitation of the law. It was claimed for this Bill that it would enable the tenant to exercise his own choice with regard to procedure as to whether he would claim under custom or under the provisions of the Act or under a special agreement. But that was no answer to the argument he had laid before the House. It might be said that the power of contracting out might be limited to a certain extent by the inclusion of claims set up under custom or special agreement. But that did not remove the main objection which he had to this sub-section, which placed it in the power of landlords to set up another procedure for settling the claims of their tenants, and for determining in their own favour. He thought that would be most prejudicial to the working of the Act, and would cause grievous disappointment among the farmers of this country. Under these circumstances he begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed to the Bill—

"In page 2, line 10, to leave out the words from the word 'arbitrat on' to the word 'under,' in line 13."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): The hon. Gentleman is quite right in assuming that the words as they stand in the Bill do give priority to any arrangement entered into between landlord and tenant with regard to the way in which these matters should be settled, and that, I take it, is the simple issue between the hon. Member and those who think with him and the Government. We have shown by this Bill that we believe in the arbitration system, but we also hold most strongly that the parties should be free, if they so desire, to make any arrangement they please for the settlement of any difficulty that may arise. There is only one possible alternative to that course. If it is not to be adopted we must make the procedure of arbitration compulsory in all cases. The hon. Gentleman tells the House that there are cases where landlords are trying to contract out of the Act in a way which is extremely injurious to the tenant. I do not deny that there may be cases of hardship here and there. But I think that even in this matter, as in others, the percentage of such cases in regard to contracts affecting agricultural tenancies will be found to be much smaller than in contracts affecting other industries. Does the hon. Gentleman seriously ask the House of Commons to compel the vast majority of owners and occupiers, who are anxious and willing to make their own arrangements, to come under the Bill, simply because in a limited number of cases injustice has been done, or may be done in the future. I resist the Amendment because I think it would be unwise thus to trammel both landlord and tenant, and I resist it also in the interests of the tenants themselves, because I believe that they value quite as highly as the owner of the land, and as hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, the right and privilege of making their own arrangements. I do not believe that they are so incapable of making arrangements as the hon. Member seems to suggest.

MR. CHANNING: Under Sub-section 5 they retain that power.

*MR. LONG: No; that is another matter altogether. If the hon. Gentleman's Amendment is carried it will make arbitration compulsory whenever any difficulty arises. What this Bill does in the words which the hon. Gentleman wishes to strike out is to leave it to the owner and occupier to settle any difficulty that may arise by that form of arbitration which they themselves select. We are told that a tenant farmer may enter into some agreement for a form of arbitration which would be unjust. I confess I have my doubts as to the existence of any very large number of these cases. But if they do exist I believe we may remedy them not by passing a compulsory enactment of this kind, but by teaching farmers to study their own interests when entering upon a holding, and to see for themselves that they do so under conditions which afford them a reasonable prospect of success. We must teach them not to rely too much upon Acts of Parliament. The less we interfere with the relations between landlord and tenant the better it is for both parties, and that being my belief I ask the House to reject the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) said he did not think that the right hon. Gentleman, by the speech he had just delivered, had shown any great confidence in the efficacy of the remedies he proposed in the Bill. The clause as it stood was a direction to the landlords that they should devise a separate scheme of arbitration rather than have recourse to the system of arbitration provided by the Bill. Now, that was evidence of very little confidence in the merits of that arbitration system. If there was any merit in this Bill at all, it was supposed to be in the process of arbitration set up in the second schedule, and yet it was proposed that any private agreement should have priority over that system. Surely it was only right they should secure to the tenants the benefits of the procedure set up by the Bill. With regard to the suggestion that the tenants should be careful in entering into agreements of this sort, surely the right hon. Gentleman knew it was a common practice to have estate rules on all large estates. In these rules an average system of arbitration was provided for, which limited the rights of the tenants, and undoubtedly care would be taken in the future to prevent tenants enjoying the benefits intended to be conferred by this Bill. He had already heard of several estates in which new rules had been introduced more or less limiting the statutory rights of the tenant, and they might depend upon it that that system of limitation would be continued unless the words with which the Amendment of his hon. friend dealt were struck out of the clause.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness) said he was very glad that his right hon. friend had so stoutly resisted the Amendment. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire had been trying to frighten the agricultural interest by suggesting that unfair agreements would be imposed on the tenants by the landlords. But that was a bogey of the hon. Gentleman's own imagination, for the interests of both landlord and tenant were completely adverse to any such proceeding. This Bill was undoubtedly a step in advance. It provided that in default of any agreement between the parties interested a certain form of arbitration procedure should be adopted. Under the old Act of 1883 such a provision did not exist, and therefore this Bill was clearly an extension of the principle of arbitration. He thought the right hon. Gentleman very correctly stated the position when he suggested that they should encourage the tenants themselves to see that they did not enter into agreements which were calculated to preclude them from making a fair living. He thought the right hon. Gentleman acted wisely in opposing the Amendment.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he did not think the last speaker was quite correct in saying that the danger apprehended by the Member for East Northamptonshire was a mere bogey of his own imagination, because the President of the Board of Agriculture had himself admitted that there might be cases of hardship under the provisions of this particular Bill.

*MR. LONG: Yes; I said there might be.

DR. FARQUHARSON said that statement of the right hon. Gentleman was a complete answer to the assertion of the hon. Member for Holderness. Our system of legislation was to legislate not for the good, but for the bad; and he thought they ought to take care to provide a remedy as far as possible for all cases of possible grievances. Personally he was not very much afraid of private arrangements, and he would bitterly regret anything calculated to prevent amicable arrangements being come to between landlord and tenant, as they were constantly in all parts of the country. All his hon. friend desired was to maintain the status quo, which would carry out exactly the principle approved of by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that landlord and tenant should have power to agree between themselves as to the amount, time, and mode of payment of compensation, and that if they could not agree their differences should be settled by arbitration. He agreed with his hon. friend, and would support him in a division.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman has, to some extent, unconsciously, no doubt, magnified the scope of my hon. friend's Amendment, and may accordingly have misled some hon. Members as to its exact application. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the impression that if this Amendment were adopted it would put an end altogether to private agreements between landlords and tenants. Of course it would have no such effect. Landlords and tenants would be quite as much at liberty to make their own private agreements if this Amendment were carried, as they would be if the clause stands as it is. The whole effect of the Amendment would be that where the landlord and tenant failed to come to an absolute agreement as to the amount, mode, and time of payment, recourse should be had to the machinery of arbitration proposed to be set up. Such cases would be comparatively rare, and, therefore, the scope of my hon. friend's Amendment is very limited indeed, because the words in the clause are conjunctive, not disjunctive, and it is only where the parties are unable to agree that recourse would be had to arbitration. On the face of it the clause proposes a fair arrangement. It is seemingly fair to say that the landlord and tenant may agree if they like as to the amount, mode, and time of payment, and that in that event the arbitrator is bound by the provisions of that agreement. That seems more or less fair, but when it is taken into consideration that in many cases the landlord is in a superior position, and can dictate to the tenant, the effect of the clause will be that the landlord will be given power, if he chooses, to contract himself out of the provisions of the Act which we are taking such pains to pass in a perfect condition, and which we all hope will do some good to the agriculturists of the country. It is not stated in any clause of the Bill that the landlord or the tenant may contract himself out, but the landlord is empowered to make any private agreement he chooses, and in that event the machinery of the Act shall be of no effect, and the arbitrator must have regard simply and solely to the terms of that private agreement.

*MR. LONG: Oh, no! It is provided that the compensation to be given by the landlord to the tenant must reach the standard laid down in the Act as amended by this Bill.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's explanation; but in point of fact it comes to this: that, as far as arbitration is concerned, the landlord and tenant can, if they choose, practically contract themselves out of the Act; and the result will be, as the right hon. Gentleman very fairly says—although he will not admit that there will be cases of injustice—that there may be cases in which injustice may ensue.

*MR. LONG: Hear, hear!

MR. HEDDERWICK: Is it beyond any reasonable doubt that such cases will occur? The land legislation which this House has passed has been based entirely on the inability of tenants and landlords to make what would be regarded by men of common sense as fair agreements, because the position of the tenants has been such, not only in England but in the north of Scotland and in Ireland especially, as to prevent them from making any fair agreement at all. I suppose it is useless to ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his position as regards this Amendment, but considering the smallness of its scope and the desirability of giving real effect to the machinery proposed in the Bill, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept it.

Formal Amendments made.

MR. CHANNING: The point raised by the Amendment standing in my name is very simple and specific, and one to which the tenant farmers have, in their various gatherings, attached exceptional importance. It is that the time over which a landlord shall be entitled to set up a counterclaim for acts of waste or breaches of covenant committed by the tenant, which is now restricted by the existing Act to four years, should be restricted to two years before the determination of the tenancy. I wish to lay concisely before the House the grounds upon which I move this Amendment. It has been felt in the Chambers of Agriculture, and in the reports of their committees, which have been laid by deputation and otherwise before the right hon. Gentleman, that it is desirable, in the interest of both parties, that there should be a time limit to these counterclaims for waste or breaches of covenant. I will at once say that if the right hon. Gentleman objects to the insertion of this Amendment at this particular point, it is quite immaterial to me at what point in the Bill it is inserted. I especially base the case for my Amendment upon the Report signed by the majority of the Royal Commission on Agriculture, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member. At the close of the chapter of the Report dealing with proposed amendments, there is a summary of recommendations, and the sixteenth of these recommendations is—

> "We recommend that the period in respect of which the landlord may consider claim for acts of waste or breaches of covenant under Section 6 of the Act, should be limited in all tenancies from year to year, to a period of two years."

Objection may be taken to the form of my Amendment, by saying that the recommendation of the Royal Commission only concerns tenancies from year to year. The majority of tenancies in England are from year to year, but this would not have application to Scotch tenancies. That is a matter which the right hon. Gentleman may perfectly easily deal with in some other portion of the Bill, by some form of limitation of this provision. What I insist on is that, after having considered the evidence of a great number of witnesses, the Royal Commission did arrive at the conclusion that in respect of all tenancies from year to year, the landlord's counterclaim should be limited to two years. Now the argument for this is very simple. In estate management it would be far better that acts of waste should be checked at the earliest possible moment. It would also simplify procedure in arbitrations under the Act. If the Bill is left in its present form the landlord or his agent may ransack the distant past to set up a counterclaim for various dilapidations, which the landlord or his agent might have long since checked. The Amendment has the unanimous support of the Chambers of Agriculture, and the hon. Member for North Hampshire supported it upstairs. So far as I understand, the arguments against it are only two: first, that it was desirable to increase rather than diminish the inducements to landlords to come under the Bill; and, second, that the Statute of Limitations would operate to check these counterclaims if they were carried beyond the limits that would make them outrageous I concede that the Statute of Limitations would check counterclaims going beyond six years, but it would not be fair to the tenant to allow the landlord to spring upon him a counterclaim for transactions going back six years, which ought to have been checked long before.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 24, after the word 'tenant,' to insert the words 'within two years before the determination of the tenancy.'"—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: The hon. Gentleman says that the Royal Commission recommended that in the case of tenants from year to year the limitation placed on the landlord's power to recover for acts of waste and breaches of covenant should be two years; but the Royal Commission had not, in making the recommendation, got before them, as the Government have since had, a general reform and amendment of the law in order to make the position of tenants more satisfactory. This proposal is one which conflicts at once with the amendment of the law which we ask the House to adopt. The hon. Gentleman said that the landlord might ransack the records of a farm for an unlimited period in order to set up a counterclaim for waste and breaches of covenants, but the Statute of Limitations would limit the landlord's power to do so to a period of only six years.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorganshire, Mid): Twenty years in the case of leases.

*MR. LONG: That does not interfere with my argument. The landlord is restricted in the recovery of his rights by the Statute of Limitations, and consequently what you do under this Bill, unless you take away from him the statutory right he now enjoys, would merely affect the manner in which he obtains redress. If the hon. Gentleman's Amendment were accepted the result would be that the landlord would claim under the Act for waste for a period of two years, but would still retain his right to claim for the further period of four years at common law. That would involve a dual procedure. The object of the Government in providing this machinery, and also in giving the landlord, for the first time, the power of bringing all his claims into a single arbitration, is, that all the differences between landlord and tenant may be embraced in one settlement. We believe it to be to the advantage of both landlord and tenant to have a complete statement of the case on each side. Hitherto there has been necessarily no knowledge on the part of the tenant, in a settlement under the Agricultural Tenants' Compensation Act, of the claims that the landlord might intend to make at common law. If the procedure provided in the Bill be availed of by the landlord, he will be able to make a full claim before the arbitrator, and the tenant and arbitrator will know what that full claim amounts to If the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman were to be adopted, this procedure would be materially interfered with, because the landlord would only claim under the Act for two years, while he would have an action at common law for four years more or longer. I ask the House not to adopt the Amendment, not because I do not share the opinion of the Royal Commission, but because, generally speaking, the landlord should exercise his rights as against his tenants during the tenancy, and not allow them to accumulate until the end of it. In the interests of good husbandry, and in those of the tenant and landlord, it is desirable that the landlord or his agent should know what is being done by the tenant, and if he believes that there is waste going on, or breaches of covenants taking place, he should step in and stop them, or let the tenant know that he means to recover in respect of them.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I think my hon. friend would be well advised to withdraw this Amendment or to re-draft it; because, although there is a good deal in the argument he used as applied to tenancies from year to year, it is quite clear that harm would be done in the case of other tenancies. It is quite true that the Royal Commission did advise the limitation of the landlords' claim in respect of waste to two years where the tenancy was from year to year, and the reason was obvious. Because in tenancies of that description it was always within the landlord's power to put an end to the tenancy at the termination of the year, and if he allows the waste to go on from year to year he has only himself to blame for the result. But the scope of the Amendment is not limited to tenancies from year to year. There are many other tenancies affected by the Bill—for instance, those in Scotland, which are generally for a period of nineteen years—and in tenancies of that description it is perfectly obvious that the landlord would have no power over the tenant, although he might be wasting the land for many years. Unless my hon. friend limits the application of his Amendment strictly to tenancies from year to year, I shall feel compelled to go into the Lobby against it.

Question put, and negatived.

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 28, after 'party,' to insert 'given by post or otherwise not later than seven days after the appointment of the arbitrator or arbitrators.'"—(Mr. Long.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) said that under this Amendment the notices might be sent in a halfpenny wrapper, and they all knew that documents in such wrappers often went wrong or were lost.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.) said that he had an Amendment on the Paper to the effect that the landlord should, before the determination of the tenancy, send in writing to the tenant a claim in respect of any waste or breach of covenant, provided that the landlord should have the power, within twenty-eight days after the determination of the tenancy, to amend his claim in respect to dilapidations to buildings occurring after the claim had been delivered. His object was that each should claim exactly what he believed due to him, and to do away with counter-claims in consequence of first claims. He had tried to pass the Amendment upstairs, but the Committee were against him. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had proposed this Amendment, that the claims should be put in not later than seven days after the appointment of the arbitrator. That was a very important concession, and he thought that under the circumstances it was very fair to both parties, and it had been accepted at a meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture the day before.

COMMANDER BETHELL was obliged to differ from the hon. Member for North Hampshire. The view of the farmers in the East Riding was that the old plan was better—that the tenant should make his claim, and that afterwards the landlord should make his so-called counter-claim. He had moved an Amendment in that direction upstairs, but the Committee took an unfavourable view of it. The right hon. Gentleman's Amendment was a sort of compromise between the extreme view held by the hon. Member for North Hampshire and that held by himself, and he supposed that, although he believed it would have been better had the old plan been adhered to, he must accept what he could get.

COLONEL MILWARD (Warwickshire, Stratford-upon-Avon) did not think the Amendment would amount to very much in practice, because the first sub-section of the clause premised that the landlord and the tenant would first of all meet and endeavour to come to some agreement as to compensation. He believed that valuers would be present and take part in these deliberations, and that it would be only after they failed to come to an agreement that the arbitrator would be appointed. The Amendment, however, seemed to encourage them to go on with arbitration instead of by preliminary agreement.

*MR. LONG: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is mistaken in his view. There is no prohibition of a friendly discussion between the landlord or his agent and the tenant to settle their differences, as indeed they do in a great majority of cases. But where that is not done, and differences of opinion arise as to the particular value of particular improvements, or otherwise, then the arbitrator is called in to decide. The effect of this Amendment is to compel the landlord to bring in his claim within seven days after the appointment of the arbitrator, and it would simply prevent delay.

MR. S. T. EVANS said that this Amendment would effect one very serious alteration of the law. The right hon. Gentleman might not be aware of a decision of the Courts four or five years ago, under the principal Act, to the effect that the landlord might have a set-off against the tenant, but could not recover a sum that would overtop the claim of the tenant. It was perfectly clear that under this Amendment the landlord could recover the whole of his counter-claim.

*MR. LONG: That is undoubtedly the whole scheme of the Bill. Our object is to abolish the present law by which the landlord can put in a claim as a set-off under the principal Act, but he likewise enjoys his power at common law to claim and recover in many other matters. What we seek here is to induce the landlord to bring all his claims into one procedure, and not to have a dual arbitration—one under the Act, and the other at common law.

The Amendment was amended by leaving out "by post or otherwise" and inserting "by registered letter"; and, so amended, was agreed to.

Formal Amendments made.

COLONEL MILWARD, in moving the next Amendment standing in his name, said he was very anxious, in consequence of very strong representations which he had received from the country, that the right hon. Gentleman should state exactly what the course of the procedure would be in reference to arbitration. The sub-section, as it now stood, he thought, was fantastic. It said, "An arbitration shall, unless the parties otherwise agree, be by a single arbitrator." That was to say, either party might force the other to have a single arbitrator. The law hitherto, except in the Scotch Act of 1889, was that if either party objected to a single arbitrator there would be two arbitrators together with an umpire. This was provided for both in the principal Act, and in the Arbitration Act of 1889.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): If my hon. and gallant friend will excuse me, the section in the Arbitration Act makes provision for various cases. First, if the parties do not agree to a single arbitrator they apply to the court to appoint one; and then there is the other case where two arbitrators are appointed with an umpire.

COLONEL MILWARD said he was obliged to the Attorney General for his correction. He thought that it would be much more simple and English to go back to the Act of 1889, and say that a single arbitrator might be appointed, but if the parties did not concur, then the two arbitrators with an umpire should be appointed. He did not think that the question of expense would come in, because he could not conceive of any case in which each of the parties was not assisted from the first by a valuer. He was strongly in favour of a single arbitrator where both parties concurred, but he thought it would be very hard, if one of them wished to have two arbitrators and an umpire, that the Act should prevent it. He begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 39, to leave out sub-section (5) of Clause 2, and insert '(5) If the parties concur there may be a single arbitrator appointed by them jointly, but if the parties do not concur in the appointment of a single arbitrator, each of them shall appoint an arbitrator, and the arbitrators so appointed shall appoint an umpire.'"—(Colonel Milward.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'An arbitrator shall' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: I am afraid my hon. and gallant friend has got confused as to the operation of the Act. The Arbitration Act of 1889 adopts the principle of a single arbitrator, and the section to which the attention of the House has been called merely provides the necessary machinery for the appointment of an arbitrator or the appointment of two arbitrators and an umpire in the event of their being required. What my hon. friend suggests is that the proposal of the Bill that where the arbitration procedure is adopted the presumption shall be in favour of a single arbitrator. The parties, as I have previously pointed out, have full power to act according to agreement, and if they desire to have two arbitrators they duplicate the procedure; but the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners is that there should be one arbitrator. My hon. friend appears to be confused in his mind as to the duties of an arbitrator. If either party chooses to be advised by a skilled adviser they are entitled to employ him either before or after the arbitrator is appointed. The system my hon. friend advocates has long ago been dealt with, because it really amounts to this, that under the system of two valuers and an umpire they appoint an equitable judge who occupies the position of a single arbitrator. But those who do not require skilled advice can go before a single arbitrator and state their case and rely upon his position to secure fair treatment. There is, therefore, absolute freedom for the parties either to proceed on their own powers or the powers of their skilled advisers. All we say is that the court to which these cases come should be presided over by a single arbitrator who would hear and decide the case, rather than a court composed of two arbitrators with an umpire selected by them. It is self-evident that the new machinery tends not only in the direction of efficiency, but also of economy, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persist in a proposal which would only be destructive to a part of the Bill which only tends to cheapen the machinery.

COLONEL MILWARD, expressing satisfaction with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman, begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUCHANAN said he hoped that, after the remarks he had just made, the right hon. Gentleman would support the Amendment he now proposed to move, because that Amendment simply carried out the principle which the right hon. Gentleman had just enunciated. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out a few moments previously that the main object of the Bill before the House was that in the future the court should consist of a single arbitrator. All that this Amendment proposed was to insure that that should be the procedure, and that there should be no possibility of any other procedure being adopted. There was a great consensus of opinion throughout the country as to the cumbersome machinery of the old Act, but after what the right hon. Gentleman had said he did not think he need labour that point. There was another Bill before the House in which the principle of a single arbitrator was proposed without any appeal whatever, and although he did not intend to propose that such a clause should be put into this Bill, it certainly was an argument in favour of a single arbitrator. But if the clause as it now stood was incorporated in the Bill very little benefit would accrue, because the landlords would always endeavour to make such a provision in their agreements with the tenants that if a tenant desired to take advantage of the proceeding under the Bill he would be compelled to agree to two arbitrators. The object of his Amendment was to prevent that, and in moving the Amendment he was only endeavouring to fortify the Bill in the direction which the right hon. Gentleman thought would confer the greatest benefit on the rural community. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 39, to leave out the words, 'unless the parties otherwise agree.'"—(Mr. Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press the Amendment. The Government considered that the best form of arbitration was before one arbitrator, but it did not necessarily follow that that form ought to be made compulsory upon those who preferred another form of arbitration. All that the Government proposed was that where the parties did not otherwise agree there should be one arbitrator. He therefore hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Question put.

MR. BUCHANAN said the Amendment he now desired to move raised a question of considerable importance with reference to the right to appeal. The principle as at present laid down was that there should only be an appeal upon a question of law, but it had been pointed out that the only way in which an appeal might be taken on the schedule was upon a question of law and of fact as well. And as he read the Bill he gathered that at any point of the proceedings a party could go to the judge at the county court and ask him to intervene in the proceedings, which practically amounted to an appeal on a question of fact as well as law. From the county court there was an appeal to the High Court of England or the Court of Session of Scotland. The House had heard many explanations of how this Bill was to simplify and cheapen procedure; but if these appeals were allowed, instead of the cost being decreased there would be a very substantial increase. The object of his Amendment was to carry out the policy of the Bill as it had been set forth, which was to simplify and cheapen the procedure, and therefore he hoped it would be accepted. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 4, to leave out from the word 'final,' to the end of Sub-section 6 of Clause 2."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the point of the Amendment was that if a question of law arose out of an arbitration the decision of the county court judge should be final. The effect of this would be that there would be a great divergency of decisions, which surely was not desirable. One opinion would be held by one county court judge and one by another, and there would be no means of reconciling those opinions. The hon. Gentleman was under a misapprehension as to what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture had said. It was impossible that the President of the Board of Agriculture should have said that the Bill gave a right of appeal on a question of fact, because the only question for appeal was to be a question of law. Of course to arrive at the question of law the question of fact must be entered into, but the arbitrator having found the question of fact, his decision was binding on the parties.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) said it was desirable that questions of law should be settled once and for all. The county court judge was not to decide the law but to administer it, and if there was not an appeal to the High Court no settled decision would ever be arrived at. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment to reduce the power of appeal so that the appeal could only be made to the county court or the Sheriff's Court, neither of which could give a decision which was binding.

MR. BUCHANAN, after the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General, begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 13, after the word 'applies,' to insert the words, '(9) all claims, whether by tenant or landlord, shall be in writing.' ''—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said that if this Amendment were carried it would lead to a great modification in the Bill which was not desirable, and therefore he hoped it would not be pressed. He had no doubt the claims would be in writing. That would be in the usual course of business.

MR. CHANNING begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUCHANAN said that the object of the Amendment which he now proposed to move was to render the clause inapplicable to Scotland. He felt considerable difficulty in discussing the matter in the absence of his Scotch friends, but it appeared to him that the Government were here introducing in Scotland a new body for administrative and legal purposes which at present had no locus standi there. New duties were being given to the Board of Agriculture, which had neither offices nor officials in Scotland. He begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 3, line 34, to leave out the word 'sub-section,' and insert the word 'section.'" —(Mr Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'sub-section' stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG assured the hon. Member that he was mistaken. Acts were being administered in Scotland by officials of the Board, by which landlords were enabled to improve their property under the control of the Board of Agriculture. Some of the most eminent and practical agriculturists in Scotland were acting as representatives of the Board, and they were carrying out their duties to the satisfaction of the community. The Government were therefore not introducing a great change of policy for the first time in respect of Scotland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That further proceedings on consideration, as amended (by the Standing Committee), be adjourned till To-morrow."—(Mr. Moulton.)

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This motion has been made without a single word of explanation of the ground on which it has been made. I confess that I have waited for some time to see what course the Government were going to take on this motion, because it is in my experience perfectly unparalleled and unprecedented that in the course of any sitting of this House, when an important Government Bill is before the House, and is making rather slow progress, and with two pages of Amendments yet to be dealt with, a motion should be made for the adjournment of the proceedings until to-morrow without any justification whatever. I have never heard such a motion even submitted to the House, and it is certainly of an extraordinary character. That view is emphasised by the conduct of the Government, who have allowed the motion to be put to the House without the Minister in charge of the Bill giving us a word with reference to the motion. Why should we adjourn the proceedings on this Bill until to-morrow? Do the Government intend to drop or withdraw the Bill? Why are we stopping the Bill before the House in the middle of this important debate? I entirely fail to understand what the purpose of this motion is, and the only hint we have to guide us to the discovery of the reasons for this motion, and—what I attach a great deal more importance to—why the Government have received this motion on really an important matter, is the dark hint thrown out by the Leader of the House yesterday when he said he understood it would be inconvenient for some Members of the House to sit after four o'clock to-day, and accordingly he proposed to suspend the discussion of this Bill. I contend, if that be the position of the Government, that they are bound to make their own motion in the matter, and to explain to the House why they make it. I am not surprised, from one point of view, that they have adopted this extraordinary course of throwing out this hint yesterday and then running away from their own motion and getting a private Member to make it, because, if it be true, as I have heard it alleged, that the only reason for adjourning the debate is that certain Members of the House desire to attend a garden party, it is the first time in the history of the House of Commons that public business has been stopped to facilitate the attendance of Members at a garden party. We ought to know what we are doing. This is not the first occasion when hon. Members of this House in great numbers have desired to attend a garden party. We had a garden party and a great entertainment on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee. The Government on that occasion, I believe, suffered a defeat, and that may be the explanation of their conduct to-day. But I maintain that this is a new departure in the history of the British House of Commons, and the least we are entitled to is some explanation from the Government in support of it. I might mention another occasion—a much more solemn occasion certainly than anyone can pretend the occasion is to-day—that was the occasion of a Royal wedding which took place during the sitting of the House, when something might have been said on due notice in support of adjournment. I can conceive a Minister advocating an adjournment of public business to suit the convenience of Members of the House on that occasion—a much more solemn occasion than a garden party (laughter). I do not see anything ludicrous in a Royal wedding. It will be in the memory of hon. Members present that on the occasion to which I allude no proposal was made to interrupt public business for the convenience of gentlemen who desired to attend, and that the public business of the country in the House of Commons went on without interruption. I again assert that, as far as my knowledge goes—certainly as far as my experience goes—the British House of Commons has never been adjourned or public business interrupted for the purpose of allowing Members of the House to attend a garden party, and that is what we are called upon to do to-day, as far as we can gather from the gossip of the lobbies, for the Minister responsible for the motion has not deigned to give us any information. It was the practice of the House for a great many years to adjourn on the day of a great national festivity—namely, Derby Day; but a body of Members from the days since I first entered the House set themselves to abolish the practice as being a great abuse, and after fifteen or twenty years opposition, that practice, I believe, has been completely abolished by general consent, and we no longer adjourn. But now we are to set up a new practice, and, I think, a much more far-reaching, extraordinary and indefensible practice. The Derby comes but once a year, but who can say how many garden parties we may have in a year? A principle is to be laid down and a precedent established to-day that we are to adjourn the House of Commons and stop public business for the convenience of gentlemen who wish to attend garden parties. Where are we to draw the line? Are you going to adjourn the House for every Minister who chooses to attend a garden party? [AN HON. MEMBER: No.] Yes, I think we are entitled to know, before this precedent is established, where it is going to stop. If we adjourn the House to-day to enable hon. Members to attend a garden party at Buckingham Palace—I believe that is where it is to take place—why not adjourn for a garden party of the Prime Minister? You might have a garden party in the country where it would be inconvenient for Members to attend while the House is sitting. The principle is vicious, and I say it is a bad precedent. If the Government were resolved to form this totally new principle and to set up a precedent in this particular matter they ought to have given notice to the House. The proper time would have been question time yesterday, when the Minister in charge of this Bill could have got up in his place, and said frankly, "There is to be a Royal garden party, and we propose to adjourn the House of Commons to enable hon. Members to go to it." But a Minister gives a dark hint that it will be inconvenient for certain Members to attend the House this afternoon. He does not withdraw the Bill or alter the business for the purpose of meeting the convenience of hon. Members. He announces that public business will be interrupted at a certain hour for the purpose of enabling hon. Members to go to some place, the nature of which he did not disclose. Instead of explaining the grounds on which the adjournment is asked, he allows a private Member to start up and make the motion. The course of procedure is utterly unprecedented in the history of the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The hon. Gentleman has suggested that there has been concealment in this matter. I deny that there has been any concealment on the part of the Government in connection with the motion for the adjournment of the debate on the Agricultural Holdings Bill. He spoke of dark hints and obscure suggestions. There have been no dark hints and obscure suggestions. There was a plain statement made by me last night based upon a plain reason which was given. The hon. Gentleman says we are starting a new and dangerous precedent in cutting off an hour's discussion upon this Bill to-day. I do not stop to inquire, although I might if I were inclined to indulge in personalities, whether the hon. Member has constantly and anxiously laboured to prevent the unnecessary expenditure of the time of this House. Let me ask, as a plain matter of business, what is my duty when it comes to my knowledge that it would be extremely inconvenient to Members of the House, and detrimental to public business, that we should carry on the public discussion during the remaining hour. When that question is put to me I answer that clearly it is in the general interest that the motion should be made, and on account of that general interest I propose to support it. There is no principle or dangerous precedent there. How often, in obedience to the convenience of a few Members, have not Bills been delayed from one day to another where there was far less necessity for that course than in this case! It appears to me that we have got a plain, practical ground for the course we propose to pursue.

MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): I wish to make a personal explanation. I moved the adjournment because I have the next two Amendments on the Paper—I think they are important; and I did it because I understood that it was known throughout the House that contentious business was to cease at a quarter past four. I know that hon. Members have left the House thinking that further debate on this Bill would at that hour cease. I certainly did not intend to raise any cause of dissension in the House.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid): Like the hon. Member for East Mayo, I object to the adjournment of this debate. There are one or two important measures which may not be discussed this session for want of time. The Leader of the House has stated once or twice that the adjournment is asked to-day to meet the convenience of Members. I think it is incumbent that he should tell us how many Members are going to the garden party. I had no knowledge that there was to be a garden party until a few minutes ago, when the adjournment of the debate was moved. I think the Gentlemen who are going to enjoy themselves at the garden party, if they have been privileged with a Royal invitation, might have allowed those of us who are not, to go on with business. With the majority the Government have, I do not think they need fear a decrease of that majority by forty or fifty Members. I wish the right hon. Gentleman to tell us how many Members have received invitations, and how many Members will have their convenience interfered with. On this side, those who object to the adjournment of the debate might give way and allow those Members to go if there be a sufficient staff left to carry on the business. Why should the convenience of fifty or sixty Members be allowed to place itself in supremacy over the business of the country? I submit that the Government need not fear to go on with this Bill, because the division list has shown that, even when there has been a slight revolt on the part of the Government's followers, as happened last night on the question of the inherent capabilities of the soil, there has always been a sufficient majority to carry any Amendment the Government propose or to refuse any Amendment brought forward by an individual Member.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I join in the protest against the adjournment of the debate. The explanation of the hon. and learned Member seems to me a very peculiar one. It amounted to this: he has got some Amendments on the Paper, and he found that Members were leaving the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: That was only a personal explanation on the part of the hon. Member. It is not material to the question before the House now.

MR. MADDISON: I thought it was more than that, and entered into the debate, but I shall leave that point alone.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member prefaced his remarks by stating that he rose to make a personal explanation.

MR. MADDISON: I cannot help thinking that this is really a flagrant abuse of Parliament. It is a gross waste of the time of the House, which Mr. Gladstone used to call the national treasure. The right hon. Gentleman in his very ingenious speech tried to make out that he had to consult the convenience of Members of the House. That is quite true. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the number of Members who are going to the garden party is so large that it would materially affect the discussions in the House on this Bill? If the right hon. Gentleman had been able to show that, we will say, 200 or 300 Members were going to the garden party, then, of course, the business of the House would be practically stopped; but the chances are that only a small number of Gentlemen have received invitations to this garden party. Being a Royal party it will be, I presume, if one has to say so, select. [Laughter.] I do not think it at all follows, but I suppose in courtesy you have to say "select," and therefore the number will be small. [Laughter.] Yes, the number of Members who have received invitations, I am quite certain, will be a very small proportion of this House. The right hon. Gentleman's speech had no body in it, no substance in it, no point in it, unless he can show us that the number is so large as to materially affect the discussion of this Bill. If he had told us that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill was desirous to go to the Royal garden party I should say that that would be a very considerable loss to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman does not look as if he were going to a garden party. I mean to say there is nothing in the right hon. Gentleman's latest speeches to show that exhaustion which, I take it, a garden party might help to remove. In fact, everything was going on smoothly. The Bill was not being obstructed. The Bill was being discussed, and although, an ignorant townsman, I had to grope my way along during the discussion, I was able to get gleams of light even from the right hon. Gentleman, as well as from Members on this side of the House. I would put it to the House calmly and fairly—here we are in the midst of a Bill which deals with tenant rights and with the condition of farmers. We are constantly being told on the other side of the House that agriculture is the greatest industry. Now mark this: when we are dealing with the greatest industry in the country, when the right hon. Gentleman is telling us that they are fulfilling their election pledges, they suddenly break off in the middle of their work, just because there happens to be a gathering of Royal and other personages at Buckingham Palace. I say this solemnly, I say it earnestly, that no worse object lesson could be given to the workmen of this country than for this House, that is the mother of Parliaments, to be so frivolous, to be so vain, to have so little regard for the nation's business, as to go off at the first approach of Royalty. Why, the discussion of one clause of this Bill is worth all the garden parties you have in this country, and all the Royalties as well. [Cries of "Order, order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman will withdraw the words "and all the Royalties as well." [Cries of "Withdraw!"]

MR. MADDISON: I shall not withdraw for hon. Members opposite; but if the Speaker says it is not in order I shall withdraw at once.

*MR. SPEAKER: I said it was not in order.

MR. MADDISON: Then, of course, I at once withdraw. When I remember that the right hon. Gentleman in his place deliberately told us that he would not give us one hour to discuss the Children's Bill, a Bill affecting the vital interests of the people, and then that he can waste and squander an hour and a quarter on a useless visit to a useless garden party, then I say it is a shame that the working people of this country should be so treated.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I consider that hon. Gentlemen are wasting public time. This is an attempt to suspend the business of the House for a Court function. I think we are the representatives of the people and the trustees of the people. My hon. friend had the misfortune to be called to order. I will not make that mistake. I know perfectly well the rules of the House with reference to Royalty. You cannot refer, except in certain terms, to two Royal personages—the Queen and the Prince of Wales. You can speak as you like of other Royalties. I say that this House is forgetting its duty to the constituencies, and that it is behaving falsely to the trust placed in it, if it gives one moment of the public time to enable Members to go and masquerade in a place like Buckingham Palace. The Irish Members come here at great inconvenience, and we do not wish the business of the House adjourned for any Court function whatever. We have come here to discharge serious business. If the House of Commons is to suspend the vital business of the country for any State function it appears to me that this kingdom is like Rome on the eve of destruction.

MR. SPEAKER: The question is not the adjournment of the House. It is whether the proceedings on this Bill should be adjourned until to-morrow.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I suppose we will discuss the adjournment of the House later on. Having regard to the Bill before the House, which is ostensibly to make the lives of agricultural labourers happier, I really think that a motion for the adjournment of the debate is a waste of public time. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham will support the motion for the adjournment, and show how consistent he is in connection with the policy of "three acres and a cow."

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) rose to speak.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

POST OFFICE SITES (RECOMMITTED) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) in the Chair.]

Clause 1 :—

Question again proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) : I should like some explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury as to why Section 133 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, is excepted. This section is to apply to the case of post office sites with certain exceptions. I want to ascertain from the Secretary to the Treasury why these exceptions to the Lands Clauses Act are being made. Is the Secretary to the Treasury prepared to give us some explanation why Section 133 does not apply ?

MR. HANBURY : I should like to hear the hon. Member's explanation of it.

MR. CALDWELL : Then I will give it. Whenever the promoters of a building scheme take possession of lands and demolish houses they are bound under Section 133 to pay to the rating authorities in respect of land tax and poor rate until the property is ready for rating purposes again. They are bound in the interval between demolishing the buildings and the completion of the works to pay to the rating authorities the same rates as those authorities had received up to the time when the compulsory powers were taken. That is briefly what is provided for in the Lands Clauses Act. I should like to know upon what principle the Government have acted in providing that this clause shall not apply in the case of the property of the Government. In the year 1845 the Government did not pay rates like other people, and they were under no legal obligation to make a contribution for rates. The Secretary to the Treasury knows perfectly well that the Government, during his term of office, have altered altogether their method of dealing with these matters, and they now admit that the Government must pay rates the same as anybody else. The Government have been giving effect to that system in England during the past two or three years, and having done that, what grounds have the Government now for turning round and saying that during the progress of these works, when they demolished the buildings and deprived the local rating authority of the rateable value they got before, they should not pay the rates ? There was a reason for such a course some years ago, but there is no reason for it now. What would be the effect of this upon the vestries of London ? You demolish a large building site, and the effect of your demolition will be that before your new buildings are ready for rating the vestry will be deprived of the rates which they otherwise would have received. I should be very glad if the Secretary to the Treasury would explain why the Government have taken this course.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.) : I beg to call your attention, Mr. Grant Lawson, to the fact that there are not forty Members present.

MR. FLAVIN : And may I call your attention, Mr. Grant Lawson, to the fact that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House have deliberately gone out ?

The usual interval having elapsed, and forty Members not being present,

The House adjourned at ten minutes after Five of the clock, till To-morrow.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIABILITY OF SHIPOWNERS AND OTHERS) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD HENEAGE: My Lords, this is rather an important Bill, although we have the advantage of the fact that it comes up from the House of Commons with the unanimous support of that House, it having passed through all its stages there without a division. The object of the Bill is to limit the excessive amount of liability to which shipowners and dock-owners and others are subject under the present law. It has been under the consideration of all those who are interested for a considerable period, and the outcome of a conference between all the parties practically and financially interested is the present agreement, which has been carefully considered, and has been embodied in the Bill. The Bill has not only been before a Standing Committee of the House of Commons, but it has been thoroughly thrashed out in that House, with the assistance of the Solicitor General and the Board of Trade. The whole question, therefore, comes before your Lordships with very good credentials. It has the unanimous approval of the House of Commons and of the whole body of shipowners and dock-owners, harbour authorities, and other conservancy bodies throughout the United Kingdom. Under those circumstances it is not necessary for me to argue to your Lordships at any length upon the necessity of the measure. I could give your Lordships a number of instances to show that great hardship has been imposed upon both dock-owners and shipowners in respect of the unlimited liability to damage at present imposed upon them. Both parties desire that their liability shall be limited, and this Bill represents the agreement they have arrived at. The object of the Bill is, in the first clause, to limit the liability of shipowners in relation to "fixed objects"; and, in the second clause, to give a corresponding reciprocal relief in regard to liability for damages to dock-owners, harbour authorities, and others. The Bill does not interfere in any degree with the question of damages in respect of loss of life at sea. It does not put forward any new liability whatever. It asks, in the first clause, that the Section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 shall be extended to "fixed objects." Under the law as it now stands, the liability of shipowners for damage done to "property at sea" inflicted accidentally is limited to £8 per ton. It does not appear to men of common sense, and those interested in the trade, and others that there is any reasonable objection to that limitation being extended to "fixed objects." I will read to your Lordships a few words from the section to which I have alluded. Subsection (1) of Section 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 enacts that—

"The owner of a ship shall not be liable to damages beyond the following amounts:—'In respect of a damage to vessels, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not, an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.'"

But, my Lords, no such limitation exists by law for damage to "land, fixed piers, docks, canals, wharves, or landing stages," and, as I have said, there does not appear to men of common sense any reason against such limitation. It is a very difficult thing to know what the value of docks and harbours and canals are at the present time. You cannot assess them by tons as you do ships. Now, this is not a new limitation, because I am informed that it actually exists in France at the present moment, and that legislation is in progress in other countries in the same direction. By the first clause of the Bill it is proposed to extend this provision of Section 593 of the Act of 1894 to the "fixed objects" I have mentioned. It is not a referential clause: it is perfectly plain and clear. It enacts that the limitation shall

"extend and apply to all cases where (without their actual fault or privity) any loss or damage is caused to property or rights of any kind, whether on land or on water, or whether fixed or movable, by reason of the improper navigation or management of the ship."

I believe that as a matter of fact no one takes exception to that clause. The only difficulty that arises is that whilst the dockowner and the harbour authorities and the conservancy boards are willing to grant that limitation in the case of shipowners, they ask for some reciprocal legislation on their own account, on the ground of the large size and tonnage of the vessels now being built. Mr. McArthur, who had charge of the Bill in the House of Commons, speaking on the Second Reading,* said—

"We recognise that the contention is a reasonable one, and therefore shipowners not only assent to that contention, but they are willing to assist in every way the action of the dock authorities to have a clause to that effect inserted in the Bill in Committee. We are willing to concede to the dock authorities a corresponding limitation to that which we claim for the shipowners."

The second clause of the Bill is the unanimous result of the deliberations of the shipowners and dockowners and others interested, and of a very useful discussion both in the Standing Committee and in Committee of the whole House, in which, although several Amendments were moved and some few were accepted, there was no division of opinion whatever and no division took place. The first clause of the Bill is very easy to follow, because it is simply an extension of the principle of the Act of 1894. The second clause is rather technical, and it may appear at first sight to be rather illogical; but I am bound to say that, having looked into the question myself before I took charge of the Bill, and having had some considerable knowledge of merchant shipping legislation during my connection with the Humber ports for twenty years, I believe that it is a good working agreement and is quite practicable. Under Clause 2, the "aggregate liability" of dock and harbour authorities and other conservancy boards will not exceed £8 per ton; but I wish to point out distinctly that the maximum liability will not be based on the damage done to any individual vessel or on the damage done to any dock, but on the tonnage of the largest ship which has been within the area over which such dock or other authority has jurisdiction within five years previous to the accident. This sum would be apportioned in any accident between one or more vessels that might be damaged, the damage being assessed on the actual value of the vessels and of the cargoes on board of them. I have here some instances of how that would work, but I do not think it is a wise thing on the Second Reading to give figures, because it is impossible for anyone to discuss them at the moment, and I therefore content myself with saying that in Committee I shall be perfectly ready to give the cases, and to show that whilst this provision may not seem very logical, we know exactly what are the results that will be incurred by the Bill, and we are perfectly prepared to meet them. There is one other point with regard to the second clause to which I should like to call your Lordships' attention. It is not thought fair that the maximum liability should be increased because some vessels of a very large size may have been within the area which do not usually come into the port; it is not considered reasonable that the measure of liability should be fixed by the fact of some very large vessel having accidentally come within the area for shelter, or just to load mails and passengers. Therefore there is a proviso to this clause that a ship is not to be deemed to be within the area

"by reason only that it has taken shelter within or passed through such area on a voyage between two places both situated outside that area, or has loaded or unloaded mails and passengers within the area."

These latter words were expressly put in in the House of Commons to protect the port of Queenstown. My Lords, this agreement, as I have said, is the result of the unanimous decision of the men of business and practical common sense, men who alone are interested financially and practically in the limitation of liability, either as receivers of damages or as payers of damages, and they ask your Lordships to join with the House of Commons in giving it Parliamentary sanction. Before I leave this subject I should like to tell your Lordships what was the opinion of Her Majesty's Government by their authorised spokesman before the Bill left the House of Commons. Sir Edward

* For Second Reading Debate in the Commons, see The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxx., page 1366; for Debate on Bill as amended by Standing Committee, see Vol. lxxxiv., p. 1226.

Carson, speaking in Committee on the Bill as Solicitor General, said—

"Certainly the proposal to which exception is taken is not a logical or ideal proposal. The Board of Trade, however, have endeavoured to obtain as far as possible the views of the great shipowners and associations represented, and in the same way they have the opinion of the dockowners, that the proposal as to limitation is the only one they can agree upon; and it has been embodied. If the Bill is not passed there will be no limitation at all."

And, in replying later to a suggested Amendment, the Solicitor General said—and I venture to hope that the Government will not depart from it in this House. Your Lordships will bear in mind that this Bill has nothing to do with loss of life at sea and imposes no new liability which does not exist under the present law. The second clause was submitted to the closest examination by the officials of the Board of Trade and by the Standing Committee on Trade in the House of Commons. It was thoroughly discussed in Committee of the whole House, and no division was taken upon the Bill. The Bill is based on mutual reciprocity and the terms of the agreement are in the Bill; and having regard to the credentials of the Bill and its unanimous adoption by the House of Commons, I feel fully justified in recommending the principle and clauses of the Bill to your Lordships' favourable consideration.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Heneage.)

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, I do not rise to object at all to the Second Reading of this Bill. I think that, as the shipowners and the dock authorities have come to an agreement that the liability of the dock authorities should be limited, your Lordships will be disposed to carry out that agreement. I only rise to mention a very small matter. I am speaking now in the interests of the dock authorities of Belfast. As I understand, the measure of liability is to be the tonnage of the largest vessel which in ordinary normal cases trades to a port. Your Lordships may perhaps know that in Belfast very large vessels are built, which, as soon as they are built and fitted out, go away and trade to other ports, and their tonnage is very much in excess of the tonnage of the ordinary vessels going to Belfast. Now, I should hope that as the House of Commons has made exception in favour of vessels which only unload mails at Queenstown, a similar exception may be made in favour of the docks of Belfast in regard to those enormously large vessels which are built there but do not trade to the port. I propose to submit to your Lordships an Amendment to carry that out, and I hope my noble friend will give it his favourable consideration.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, I rise to state to the House what the attitude of the Board of Trade will be in regard to the proposals now contained in this Bill. The noble Lord, I think, stated accurately the history of the circumstances under which this Bill is presented to the House in the form in which it now appears, and he told your Lordships that it had come to this House without a division in the other House of Parliament. I think that is accurate, but it will be entirely a mistake to suppose that the Bill as now presented to this House is in the same form or anything like the form in which its promoters introduced it into the other House of Parliament. The fact is that for a short Bill of the kind, it has, I think, been as much if not more changed and been the subject of more different changes than almost any other Bill of a similar length of which I have had experience. As introduced in the other House of Parliament it contained a clause limiting the liability of shipowners for damage to "fixed property"—and in fact, I think I may say all kinds of property, whether the property was on land or on water, whether it was fixed or movable—to the amount of £8 a ton. To that clause the then Attorney General—now known to us here as Lord Alverstone—offered no opposition, but he did on behalf of the Government oppose the second clause of the Bill, which altered the mutual liability for damage as between British and foreign shipowners, and that clause in consequence of the opposition of the Govenment was withdrawn in Grand Committee. When that stage had been reached the owners of docks put in their word and thought that, if there was to be this further limit of liability of shipowners to damage in regard to their property, there ought to be some reciprocity in the matter, and that they ought to have a limit of damage for which they might be made liable in the event of damage by the action of their servants to the property of the shipowners. To that principle the late Attorney General gave a general assent, but it is not easy to see the logic of the clause which has been devised. The noble Lord who introduced the Bill said quite frankly that when you look at it at first sight it seems to be illogical. I venture to suggest to the House that the more you look at it the more illogical it is likely to appear, and I think the remarks which the noble and learned Lord below the gangway has made show that this is a clause in the nature of a compromise, and when there is cake going (so to speak) everyone wants to have a slice. Queenstown has protected itself by an Amendment in the other House; now there is a plea on behalf of Belfast; and, if the plea of Queenstown was logical and to be admitted, it seems to me it will be rather difficult to find a distinct principle against the suggestion made by the noble and learned Lord. But, my Lords, the real case for this Bill is not I think the soundness or the logical nature of the provisions which are contained in it; the only case there is for it I think is that it is a matter of agreement as between the parties chiefly interested as the noble Lord says. Whether that is a sufficient reason for placing upon the Statute-book a Bill which even its own parents do not, I think, regard as perfect, and which they have been fully warned is a Bill which, as a matter of legal interpretation is full of doubt and full of difficulty, is a matter upon which I certainly expected that some of the legal talent in this House might have something to say. My Lords, the history of Clause 2, which is the clause to which I more particularly refer, is this. As I have said, when the liability of the shipowners to the dock-owners was being limited, the dock-owners asked that their liability to the shipowners should also be limited, and it was suggested, and, in fact, at one time agreed, that the liability of the dockowners should be fixed at a rate not exceeding—

"£8 for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been within the area over which such dock or canal owner, harbour authority, or conservancy authority, performs any duty or exercises any power."

That was found not to be satisfactory, and the clause was amended by the Grand Committee so as to confine it to the largest ships which had traded to or from the port. But the clause was again amended by the House so that as the Bill now comes up to your Lordships it provides that the damage is to be based—"On the tonnage of the largest ship which has been within the area over which such dock or other authority has jurisdiction within five years previous to the accident," with a proviso excusing vessels taking shelter or merely passing through the area. That last proviso is the one to which the noble and learned Lord alluded in his remarks to the House. I am sure the noble Lord in charge of the Bill did not intend to give an erroneous impression to the House, but he quoted some words of the present Solicitor General, as if the Government had in any way made themselves responsible for the Bill. That is not so, and so far from that being so, the present Attorney General, Sir Robert Finlay, remarked in Grand Committee "that the clause as it now stands would give a great deal of work to the lawyers," and "that he knew nothing analogous to it in law." In spite of that, as I have said, it is an agreement between the two chief interests principally concerned—the dock-owners and the shipowners. It is a matter of compromise between them, a matter with which, as I have said, not only are they satisfied, but apparently, from the communications which have reached the Board of Trade, they are clearly desirous of seeing passed into law. And under those circumstance—as the legal profession contains many estimable men—if the dock-owners and the shipowners like as between themselves to run the risk of the litigation which they are warned will ensue, it does not seem to the Board of Trade that it is necessary for the Board of Trade to interfere and prevent this agreement being carried out. Therefore, I am instructed to say, on behalf of the President of the Board of Trade, that as he is perfectly aware that there would be considerable, in fact, I may say bitter, disappointment in shipping circles if this Bill were not passed, on the whole the Board of Trade are inclined to recommend the House to pass the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I am very reluctant to interpose for a moment where everybody seems to be so harmonious, but I am bound to say that it seems to me that the second clause which has been referred to is both illogical and absurd, and I should think in practice it is hardly susceptible of being administered without a degree of litigation which, however profitable to those engaged in it, I should have thought would not be of advantage to those persons who are principally interested. Your Lordships, I think, can hardly take in—no one, I think, would be able to take in without considerable reflection on the subject—the sort of proposition which is to be laid down in order to limit liability. The question of so much per ton is, of course, not very easy to apply to docks or harbours. They are not weighed, and you cannot tell what their tonnage is, which is the proposition with which you have to deal. Then, in order to get rid of that difficulty the reciprocal advantage by the dock or harbour authority is that they are to have when the accident occurs a calculation about what is the largest British ship that has been there within a period of five years. I can imagine a great many interesting controversies arising upon that. Then somebody suggested that if you take five years and find out all the ships that have ever gone in and out of the docks during that period, and then consider which was the biggest of them, and take that as your standard, some huge ship which came into the docks simply through stress of weather would be included. Then comes this interesting compromise, "Well, although it has been within the area during the five years, you must consider that it has not been within the area during the five years," and so on. That is the sort of legislation which your Lordships are asked to pass. As I say, I do not like to interfere when everybody is so harmonious, but I can only say that there is one class of Her Majesty's subjects who do not appear to have been considered in this compromise—namely, Her Majesty's judges, who will have the administration of this piece of legislation. It is therefore not without protest that I abstain from moving the rejection of such a clause as this. It seems to me to be an extremely absurd clause, extremely difficult to administer, and I cannot help thinking that it is not a particularly good precedent to say that because two interests in the country are agreed upon it the Houses of Parliament should be induced by reason of that agreement to pass legislation which nobody can venture to say is either reasonable or profitable.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, the Bill which I have asked your Lordships to read a second time is a Bill proposing to improve some details of county court administration in Ireland, and I think it will be found very useful in practice. It has been brought to my notice for some years by deputations and correspondence and references in the press that there are many matters in which there might be some advantageous changes made in Irish county court procedure, and my attention has been directed to the circumstance that there are many provisions of the English county court procedure that might be adopted with advantage in Ireland. The result of my consideration is found in the present Bill, which, of course, largely deals with details. I may say we propose, among other things, to make provision for the service of default summonses and for the enforcement of decrees in a better way, also for giving a seal to the county court; and there are provisions with regard to the attachment of debts and for the facilitating and cheapening of proof and various other matters of important detail connected with administration. I am ready to explain any of those matters when we get to the next stage, but I think your Lordships will be satisfied on the present occasion with this short statement, and accord the Bill a Second Reading.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

CRUELTY TO WILD ANIMALS IN CAPTIVITY BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD explained that, in order to carry out the statement he made on the Second Reading of the Bill, he had drafted and now proposed certain Amendments to Clause 2. That clause was not intended to interfere with any sports; and to make the matter quite clear, he moved Amendments which would result in Clause 2 reading as follows:—

"Any person shall be guilty of an offence who, whilst an animal is kept in close confinement, or is maimed, pinioned, or subjected to any appliance or contrivance for the purpose of hindering or preventing its escape from such confinement, shall by wantonly or unreasonably doing or omitting any act,—cause or permit to be caused any unneccessary suffering to such animal; or shall cruelly abuse, infuriate, tease, or terrify it, or permit it to be so treated."

The Amendments were agreed to.

Bill recommitted to the Standing Committee, and to be printed, as amended. [No. 182.]

COLONIAL STOCK BILL [H.L.].

Read 3ª (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

RAILWAYS (PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS) BILL.

ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Read 3ª (according to Order), and passed.

IMITATION OF COUNTY COURT PROCESS BILL [H.L.].

Read 3ª (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

CHARITABLE LOANS (IRELAND) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

COPYRIGHT BILL [H.L.].

Read 3ª (according to Order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES—FREE DISTRIBUTION TO PEERS.

*LORD HAWKESBURY: My Lords, I rise to ask the Prime Minister whether arrangements can now be made by which Peers may be supplied with copies of The Parliamentary Debates in the same way as Members of the House of Commons. I should like to explain that I am not asking that these papers should be circulated to Members of this House, because it is obvious that if, as is possible, many Members may not care to have them, a request for 600 more copies to be printed would be asking for a very unnecessary and wasteful expense to be incurred. I am only asking that Peers may be placed in the same position as Members of the House of Commons, and may be able to obtain the Debates on application. I understand that in the House of Commons Members may obtain the Debates in daily parts by filling up a request for them upon the Pink Paper which is issued to them, or by giving a general order for the bound volumes to be sent them as they are completed. When I put this question to the noble Marquess at the head of the Government a year ago, his reply was that it was impossible to make any change in the arrangements during that year, because no Estimate had been voted; but as he was good enough to say that the matter should receive consideration during the recess, I have ventured to repeat the question now, in the hope that the authorities of the Treasury, who have no doubt considered the matter since that time, have been able to consider it favourably.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, it will be satisfactory to the noble Lord to hear that I am authorised by the Prime Minister to say that if any Peer will apply for The Parliamentary Debates to the Printed Paper Office, he will receive them.

House adjourned at a quarter-past Five of the clock, till to-morrow, half-past Ten of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 12th July, 1900.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

SPALDING URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (WATER) BILL. (BY ORDER.)

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th July], "That this House doth agree with the Lords Amendments in page 6, line 21, to leave out from '1889,' to end of Clause 9."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. RECKITT (Lincolnshire, Brigg): Before this Bill goes through, I should like to state that the matter raised in this House last week with regard to the position of two of the employees of the company has been settled. The engineer is to receive £340 as compensation from the water company, while the collector is to continue in his post and become the servant of the urban district council. This being satisfactory to both parties, I think it right to put the House in possession of the terms of settlement.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—LATEST NEWS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) asked whether there was any fresh news from China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no news from Peking, nor have we any confirmation of the various reports which have reached us through native sources. We have received the following message from the Commander-in-Chief, viâ Chefoo:—

"Tientsin, July 7.—Chinese continue sniping, often shelling the settlements. They are extending their lines along Lutaian Canal, to the north-eastwards, and appearing in greater force to the west of the city. Yesterday we bombarded city and immediate suburbs, which stopped Chinese gun fire for some time. French settlement and railway station most subjected to attack. To-day another bombardment will take place as yesterday. Am steadily getting more guns up. Ten thousand troops now here, more required, but both Russian and Japanese expected."

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): Is the edict published in this morning's papers, purporting to be issued by the Chinese Government, authentic or not?

*MR. BRODRICK: I have stated that I have no fresh news from Peking.

MR. MONK (Gloucester): Is it not possible for the Government to obtain authentic information from the Chinese Minister at this Court?

[No reply was given.]

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): When will the Financial Vote with regard to China be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am afraid that I cannot give any promise at present.

COMMAND OF THE ALLIED FORCES — COMMAND OF THE BRITISH FORCE.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have arranged for a British officer of rank and experience to command the allied forces in China; and when General Sir A. Gaselee will arrive at Ta-ku.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Sir A. Gaselee, who is to command the forces sent to China, is an officer of experience and ability, and he will have the local rank of lieutenant-general. He is expected to arrive at Ta-ku about the 23rd of this month.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of my question, as to who is to command the allied forces.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no answer to give to that question.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Has any decision been come to as to the command? It is very important.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have told my hon. friend that I have no information to give him on the subject.

ANGLO-JAPANESE UNDERSTANDING.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state whether an understanding or agreement has been come to between Great Britain and Japan in connection with the situation in China.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The communications which have passed between Her Majesty's Government and Japan relate only to the prompt despatch of troops, and those communications will be laid on the Table with the Papers.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): Can the right hon. Gentleman say who is going to pay the expenses of the Japanese troops?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice of that question should be given.

ORIGIN AND WARNINGS OF THE OUTBREAK—SIR CLAUDE MACDONALD'S DESPATCHES.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Sir Claude MacDonald called the attention of the Foreign Office to statements in the Chinese papers regarding an organised agitation to extirpate foreigners in China which was expected to break out this year; and whether he advised that adequate precautions should be taken to meet such an emergency.

*MR. BRODRICK: Sir Claude MacDonald did not call the attention of the Foreign Office to any such statements in the Chinese papers, but he reported upon the existence of various inflammatory placards, to which he had drawn the attention of the Tsung-li-Yamen. The only precaution he advised previous to the outbreak was the despatch of a guard to the Legation and a man-of-war to Ta-ku. Both of these steps were taken.

BRITISH EXPORTS OF AMMUNITION TO CHINA.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any knowledge of the number of guns and the quantity of ammunition which has been since 1895 exported from this country to China by Kynoch's Ammunition Company and by the Birmingham Small Arms Company, Limited.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): As I have already stated, there is no objection to a Return showing the total quantity of guns and ammunition of various kinds sent to China from firms in this country; but I do not think it is desirable to publish the figures for any particular firm. I may say, however, that neither of the firms named by the hon. Member manufactures guns.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: On Monday† last the hon. Gentleman told us exactly how much ammunition was furnished by a German firm; on Thursday he declines to give the same information about a Birmingham firm.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the hon Gentleman aware that the chairman of this firm is a gentleman called Arthur Chamberlain?

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): Has the importation of arms into China been stopped even now?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I must ask for notice of that. Whether we have the power to stop it involves an abstruse point of international law. As far as I know, we are not at war with China.

INDIAN TROOPS FOR CHINA—COST.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what provision is being made to recoup the India Exchequer for the initial expenditure on transport and similar purposes connected with the despatch of the Indian contingent to China.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): An approximate estimate of the initial cost of the force that is being sent from India to China has been obtained from the Government of India, and forwarded to the War Office. When a Vote has been passed by the House, application for the amount will be made to the War Office.

INOCULATION AGAINST ENTERIC OF SOLDIERS ORDERED ABROAD.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a report from Dr. Conan Doyle on the Langman Hospital, South African Field Force, Bloemfontein, in which he states that there had been no death from enteric up to 5th June from among the inoculated; whether the War Office has yet any official statistics on the results of inoculation; and whether any further efforts are being made to increase the number inoculated in men now going out to South Africa and China.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As I have already explained to the House, the statistics at present available are not sufficient to enable me to give a reply to the first and second paragraphs of the question. Inoculation is offered to all men embarking from home for a country, such as South Africa or China, where enteric is prevalent; but such inoculation is purely voluntary.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—COST OF THE WAR—CONTRIBUTION FROM THE TRANSVAAL MINES.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps are being taken to secure payment of an indemnity for war expenses from the Transvaal mines.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I presume the hon. Member's question refers to the contribution towards the cost of the war which we hope to obtain from the Transvaal. I do not think it would be accurately described as an indemnity from the mines, but it would be quite premature at present to make a statement as to the precise manner in which such a contribution should be obtained.

MR. BUCHANAN: Will the Government take steps, when the British authorities at Johannesburg allow the general resumption of mining operations, to see that such conditions are imposed upon them as to take security for the payment of a part of this money?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is not our idea of the matter. Our idea is that the contribution to be provided by the Transvaal should be provided by the taxation of the country, which, of course, must necessarily fall to a large extent on the mines; but that is a different matter from what the hon. Member suggests.

† See page 945 of this volume.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that on 23rd October he promised that the mines would be expected to pay for the war?*

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I did not say that.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then what did you say?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I said exactly what I have stated to-day.

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that Professor Cunningham, who is to have a seat on the South African Commission to inquire into the charges brought against the administration of the Army Medical Department, has for many years acted as examiner in anatomy at the examinations of candidates for the Army Medical Department, for which service he received remuneration from the Army Medical service; and whether, under these circumstances, he will reconsider his decision to appoint this gentleman as a member of the inquiry into the Department with which he was formerly connected.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. gentleman has asked this question under a misapprehension. He seems to think that because a gentleman is an examiner of medical candidates for the Army Medical Department he is associated in some way with the Department and is connected thereby with the administration of the War Office. That, Sir, is an entire misapprehension.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): Who appointed him?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say; nor do I think that that question is at all material. I understand that these examiners are appointed for four years at a fixed salary, and have nothing to hope or fear from the War Office. They are not in the remotest way connected with the War Office administration, and the suggestion that a man who examines figures—because he only knows the candidates by numbers—is a person whose judgment is likely to be influenced is altogether preposterous. It might as well be suggested that men like the late Professor Huxley or Matthew Arnold, or the present Bishop of London, or any other of the distinguished men who have been sometimes called in to examine candidates, would be incapable of acting on a Commission dealing with administrative points which never came under their notice.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to state whether these examiners are to be reappointed?

MR. WARNER: Who pays these examiners? Is it the War Office?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that these questions are very inopportune. I do not believe it is the practice, as a matter of fact, to reappoint them. I shall next expect a question as to whether Dr. Church, as he is not an examiner, may not be corruptly influenced by the hope of becoming one.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is it not a fact that Professor Cunningham was appointed to this post by the head of the Army Medical Department, on which he is called upon to sit in judgment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is not so.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I want to know not whether Professor Cunningham has been appointed in his official and administrative capacity by the Secretary of State for War, but whether the Secretary of State for War did not appoint him ministerially on the advice of the head of the Army Medical Department, who is Dr. Jameson?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the Secretary of State for War did appoint him.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Do I understand that he will sit in judgment on Dr. Jameson, who has appointed him?

MR. WEIR: (Ross and Cromarty): What is the salary paid to this gentleman?

* Refer to The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxvii. p. 515.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Is it in the power of the War Office to remove or retain Professor Cunningham in his appointment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe not.

BLOEMFONTEIN — ADMISSIONS AND DEATHS FROM ENTERIC.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state the number of admissions for enteric at Bloemfontein, and the number of deaths from that disease for the six weeks ending 22nd June.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No complete Returns for the three weeks ending 22nd June have yet reached the War Office. For the three weeks ending 1st June the figures are as follows:—First week: 684 admissions, 120 deaths; second week: 269 admissions, 108 deaths; third week: 227 admissions, 93 deaths. If the hon. Member will add these figures to those which I gave him on the 3rd inst. for the previous weeks he will find that the total percentage of deaths is about nineteen.

SETTLEMENT OF SOLDIERS IN SOUTH AFRICA AFTER THE WAR.

SIR JAMES RANKIN (Hereford): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government have come to any decision as to the question of affording assistance in the way of free or assisted passages from England to South Africa to the families of soldiers who desire to settle in South Africa; and whether, when the Government have come to a decision on this matter, they will communicate their intentions to the Emigrants' Information Office, 31, Broadway, Westminster, so that the information may be properly diffused.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As my hon. friend is probably aware, a statement has already been made in the House, and the matter has been referred to a Departmental Committee. That Committee has not yet reported. I have no doubt that the suggestion contained in the last part of the question is one that will not be lost sight of by the Colonial Office.

MR. DILLON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance that no steps will be taken until the House of Commons has had an opportunity of expressing its opinion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir, I do not think I can give such an assurance.

CHAPLAINS IN VOLUNTEER CAMPS.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, having in view the possibility of sickness and accident, and in order that the ministrations of religion may be accessible to such as may need them, the Secretary of State will be prepared to sanction the appointment, in Volunteer brigade camps where no Army chaplain or clergyman, acting as such is available, of a brigade chaplain, who shall be responsible for the care of the sick in hospital during the week and for all services that may be necessary on Sundays, the said chaplain to receive the daily pay of his rank at Army rates during the camp, together with the usual allowances, but no further remuneration for Sunday services; and whether he will be prepared to allow the brigadier to have the appointment of the chaplain without reference to seniority, and to empower him at his discretion to appointfor the denomination next in numerical strength to that of the chaplain, a second brigade chaplain, whose pay shall be the same as that of the chaplain.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Secretary of State has approved the appointment by the officer commanding a Volunteer brigade camp where no Army chaplain or acting Army chaplain is stationed, of a brigade chaplain with pay for Sunday duty at £1 1s. a service up to £2 2s. a Sunday. The officer commanding may also appoint a second brigade chaplain for the next most numerous denomination, on similar terms. The duties of a Volunteer chaplain differ so greatly in amount and variety from those of an Army chaplain, especially on week-days, that there does not appear to be any reason for granting Volunteer chaplains continuous pay at Army rates. Their services are only required on Sunday. It is unlikely that the cases of serious sickness could be such as to necessitate special spiritual provision.

PAY OF MILITIA MAJORS.

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is in a position now to state if the senior majors of embodied Militia who have been doing the same work as seconds in command of Line battalions are to receive the extra pay given to the seconds in command of Line battalions; and, if so, if this additional pay will be given as from the respective dates of embodiment.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The additional 1s. a day will be granted for the period of embodiment.

BRITISH WAR SHIP OFF ZANZIBAR.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether a war ship is now stationed at Zanzibar; if not, what steps have been taken to carry out the intention of the Government in regard to this matter.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): The third class cruiser "Barrosa" was sent to Zanzibar in May last with orders to remain during the monsoon months, which last from May to the end of September. There is no intention of removing her at present.

ABYSSINIAN BOUNDARIES—EXPEDITION TO LAKE RUDOLPH.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether an Abyssinian expedition to Lake Rudolph, under the command of the Russian Leontief, reached Lake Rudolph in August last, and whether a boundary with Abyssinia, north of Lake Rudolph, has been arranged.

*MR. BRODRICK: An expedition which started from Adis Ababa, under Monsieur Leontieff, in July last, is reported to have reached Lake Rudolph. The question of boundary with Abyssinia is still under discussion.

NEW PACIFIC CABLE.

*SIR EDWARD SASSOON (Hythe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Pacific Cable Board have now definitely decided to commence the laying of their cable.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The various Governments interested have accepted the recommendations of the Pacific Cable Committee, and tenders for the establishment of the cable will be called for immediately.

INDIAN TELEGRAPH TARIFF.

*SIR EDWARD SASSOON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he would state to the House when the reduction in the Indian telegraph tariff, as promised by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, will be announced; and, whether any difficulty has arisen in the negotiations to account for the delay.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I cannot as yet state when the proposed reduction in the telegraph rate to India will take place. The consent of various parties has to be obtained, and for this time is required; but I am not aware that any difficulty has arisen in the negotiations.

*SIR E. SASSOON: Arising out of that answer, will the noble Lord say if it is intended to wait until the assembly of the International Telegraphic Conference next year, when Great Britain will have the high privilege of meeting on equal terms the representatives of Venezuela and Patagonia?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I do not think that question arises.

INDIAN FAMINE—LOAN BILL.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he intends to introduce an Indian Loan Bill; and if so, for what amount; and will it be in whole or in part for the purposes of famine relief.

LORD G. HAMILTON: There is no intention of introducing an Indian Loan Bill.

WALTHAMSTOW PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the District Council of Walthamstow have been endeavouring for some time past to get a weekly court of petty sessions established at Walthamstow; and whether, having regard to the fact that the population of Walthamstow now amounts to 90,000, and is increasing, that the court house at Stratford is three miles from Walthamstow, and that the police and others interested suffer inconvenience by travelling this distance, which entails loss of time, he will advise the establishment of a weekly petty sessions court at Walthamstow; and, if not, would he be prepared to meet a deputation, in order that the question might be fully considered.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The establishment of a new petty sessional court is a matter for the discretion of the magistrates in quarter sessions, and with their discretion I have no authority to interfere. I do not, therefore, think that any useful purpose would be served by receiving a deputation.

G.P.O.—REMOVAL TO MOUNT PLEASANT—OVERTIME PAY.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that in consequence of the removal of the Inland section to Mount Pleasant, necessitating as it has done protracted deliveries, some of the men have been working two or three hours in excess of their proper time daily, and will he state whether they will receive pay for the overtime thus worked.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The Postmaster General would be glad if the hon. Member would state to what body of men his question refers. No deliveries are made from the Inland section at Mount Pleasant. The general practice is that whenever postmen are for some special reason detained at the office and thus prevented from starting on their deliveries at the usual hour they shall be paid for such detention, provided it is not less than half-an-hour and the full normal attendance for the week is given.

MR. STEADMAN: Is it not a fact that some of the men have been working as many as twenty hours a week overtime in order to meet the extra work entailed upon them by the removal from St. Martin's-le-Grand to Mount Pleasant? They want to know if they are to be paid for that overtime.

MR. HANBURY: I understand that there are no deliveries at all from Mount Pleasant.

MR. STEADMAN: Then I will furnish the right hon. Gentleman with the names of men who have been doing the work.

POSTMEN'S STRIPES.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Treasury Minute or Minutes orginally issued regulating the grant and withdrawal of postmen's stripes.

MR. HANBURY: There is no Treasury Minute on the subject. The award and forfeiture of good conduct stripes are now regulated on the recommendation of the Tweedmouth Committee.

E.C. DISTRICT POST OFFICES—REFRESHMENT ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that, although the Treasury authorised the employment of cooks to prepare the meals of the male staff in the Eastern Central District Post Offices some months since, the arrangement has not been carried out because of the lack of accommodation and insanitary condition of the post offices; and whether the Postmaster General will take steps to carry out the necessary alterations that the staff may have the benefit of the improvements.

MR. HANBURY: The Treasury authority has not been given nor sought for the employment of cooks to prepare meals for the male staff in the Eastern Central District Post Offices; nor is it the case that the arrangement has not been carried out because of the lack of accommodation or insanitary condition of the offices. A committee has already inquired into the matter, and expects to be able to formulate a scheme shortly.

INCREASES OF POST OFFICE STAFF—CIRCULATION DEPARTMENT.

SIR J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what applications have been made during the current financial year by the Post Office to the Treasury for an increase of numbers, or pay, in connection with the Post Office staff; when they were made; and whether they were granted.

MR. HANBURY: I have not been able, with so short notice, to ascertain the facts as to the whole of the Post Office staff everywhere, but as regards the Circulation Department of the General Post Office, in which, I think, my hon. friend and the House are most interested, I find that no request for increase of numbers or pay has been refused. So lately as last Monday, for instance, an application was received for extra staff in that department alone involving an extra expenditure of £20,000 a year, and was immediately granted. Funds have, I believe, never been so freely granted to this department as during the last five years.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ORDERS—TRANSFER FORMS.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade will he explain why the Board of Trade insist on all transfers of electric lighting orders to companies being in a standard form, and refuse to allow variations required by local conditions, also on what grounds they refuse to allow the insertion of agreed provisions for the reduction of the maximum price either for public or private lighting; and whether he will consider the desirability of relaxing these departmental rules.

MR. HANBURY (for Mr. RITCHIE): The Board of Trade do not consider that deeds of transfer under electric lighting orders should contain any provisions other than those which are consequential on the substitution of a company for a local authority as undertakers. To go beyond this is to provide, under the colour of a mere deed of transfer, for matters which really require the approval of Parliament. Transferees are accordingly placed in exactly the same position with regard to price as they would have been had they obtained the order originally. The price for public supply is left to agreement, or, failing agreement, to arbitration. The price for private supply is not specifically fixed, but is left, as in the order, subject to a maximum, which may be revised periodically by the Board of Trade on the representation of the local authority. I see no reason for altering the existing practice of the Department.

RAILWAY BYE-LAWS—NEW CODE.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the New Code of Railway Bye-laws, which was submitted to the Board upwards of two years ago, and remitted to the Railway Companies with certain modifications and suggestions, has again been submitted to the Board for confirmation; and, if not, will he state the general tenour of the replies given by the railway companies to the Board's repeated requests for the adoption of a satisfactory Code of Railway Bye-laws.

MR. HANBURY (for Mr. RITCHIE): No, Sir; the revised bye-laws have not yet been submitted. When the Board of Trade receive them the Department will act on a suggestion which has been made that a conference should take place between the railway companies and those—notably the London County Council—who have criticised the proposed bye-laws. The hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that the Board of Trade cannot themselves propound bye-laws—they merely confirm such bye-laws proposed by the companies as, in their judgment, merit approval.

DISMISSAL OF SCHOOL TEACHERS—RIGHT OF APPEAL.

SIR JOSEPH LEESE (Lancashire, Accrington): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he is prepared to place upon the Table of the House a minute of the Board giving a right of appeal to teachers in cases of their alleged wrongful dismissal by managers of schools (both Board and Voluntary) which receive grants under the Day School Code.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg also to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has considered the universally expressed desire of the school teachers that no sentence of dismissal passed upon them shall be valid without the approval of the Board of Education.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): The matter is still under the consideration of the Board of Education, but I hope to be in a position to make a definite statement on the subject before the end of the session.

SEA-GOING TRAINING SHIPS—VISITS TO SCOTTISH COASTS.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether arrangements can be made for a training ship to visit Stornoway, Ullapool, and Invergordon during the summer.

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: The arrangements for the forthcoming cruise of the sea-going training ships will not admit of a visit to the places named. I may remind the hon. Gentleman that the "Calliope" was at Ullapool in June last.

GLASGOW P.O.—PROMOTIONS.

SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the late postmaster of Glasgow, a few days prior to his retirement, secured the promotion of his private clerk from the second to the first class of assistant superintendents, thereby passing over the only officer senior to him, who possessed the necessary technical certificate; whether in making that promotion the usual method of local procedure was departed from; whether the officer so passed over was refused information when he asked the postmaster whether a superior appointment was under consideration, being thereby prevented from laying before the Secretary his claims to the appointment; and whether, in view of the fact that the officer in question has placed his present appointment in the hands of the Postmaster General, with the request that an inquiry may be granted him, and that the officers of the local branch of the Postal Telegraph Clerks' Association have intimated to the chief superintendent that the general body of the staff resent the indignity placed on the assistant superintendent so passed over, the Postmaster General will grant the inquiry demanded.

MR. HANBURY: Shortly before the retirement of the late postmaster of Glasgow a promotion was made to fill a vacancy on the first class of assistant superintendents, but the officer promoted was not the postmaster's private clerk. An assistant superintendent of the second class was certified to be the best qualified for the vacant post, and he accordingly passed over the heads of four of his seniors. The proper course was taken by the postmaster in making the recommendation. It is not the practice to communicate to the staff the fact that the question of filling a superior appointment has arisen, nor is such a course necessary in order to ensure the proper weight being given to the claims of any officer. One officer only has appealed to the Postmaster General respecting the promotion, namely, the officer third on the list of second-class assistant superintendents. He was reported to be not capable of performing the duties of the higher post; and as his record is in many respects unsatisfactory, there does not appear to be any reason for making further inquiry.

FOREIGN TRAWLERS IN MORAY FIRTH.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that foreign trawlers, after making catches in the Moray Firth, do not ordinarily leave the Firth for periods sufficient to reach foreign ports; whether he will inquire into the allegation that they deliver their catches during the night to carrier boats which convey them to Aberdeen and other Scottish ports; and whether he will take steps to stop this practice if it is found to exist.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am informed by the Fishery Board that they have no reason to suppose that such a practice is followed, nor do they think it could be carried out, except in very favourable weather, and in daylight. From information furnished to them by the commanders of their cruisers, it would appear that foreign trawlers do certainly remain away from the Moray Firth sufficiently long to convey their catches to English or foreign ports, as during the past eighteen months the majority were not seen in the Firth on more than four or five separate occasions, and at the present time there are only two foreign trawlers seen occasionally fishing in the Firth.

DRIFT NET FISHING IN THE RIVER FORTH.

MR. WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he has any funds at his disposal out of which he can make compensation to the salmon fishermen who have been prevented by the recent decision in the House of Lords from carrying on the drift net fishing in the River Forth, which has been practised from time immemorial.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: If the hon. Member will refer to the Fishery Board's Annual Report for 1889, Part II., he will find that it is not correct to say that drift net fishing has been practised in the River Forth from time immemorial. I may add that the Secretary for Scotland has no funds at his disposal for any such purpose as is referred to in the question.

SCOTCH FEE GRANT.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any part, and if so, how much of the £5,000 voted last year from Imperial funds as required to maintain the Scotch fee grant at 12s. per scholar was required for that purpose, and whether the same or any part thereof has been surrendered; and if he can explain how it comes about that in 1897 he estimated that a sum of £26,000 annually out of Imperial funds would be necessary to keep the fee grant up to 12s. per scholar, whilst this year no sum whatever is borne on the Imperial Estimates for that purpose.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: Of the £5,000 voted last year to maintain the Scotch fee grant at 12s. per scholar, £2,763 was required for that purpose. The remainder (£2,237) will be surrendered at the close of the year 1900-1. The explanation of the fact referred to in the last paragraph of the question is that the amount receivable by the Department for 1899-1900 from the local taxation account was so much in excess of that anticipated, that no further sum will be required from the Vote to maintain the 12s. rate. Also, the average attendance has not increased so rapidly as was expected.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can explain how it comes about that for the year ending 31st March, 1898, when the average attendance on which the Fee Grant was paid under Section 1 of the Education and Local Taxation (Scotland) Act, 1892, was 614,616, the amount paid to counties, etc., in relief of rates was £145,625; that for the year ending 31st March, 1899, when the average attendance was 621,405, the amount paid was £161,912; and that for the year ending 31st March, 1900, when the average attendance had risen to 626,341, the amount paid was £149,073; and whether, to the extent of upwards of £20,000, there has been an over payment to the counties, etc., to the detriment of the Fee Grant Fund, which under the Act of 1892 is entitled to the residue.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: Under the Education and Local Taxation Account (Scotland) Act, 1892, Section 2, the grant to counties and burghs in relief of rates (which now includes the amount previously deducted under the Diseases of Animals Act, 1894) is the difference between the total—namely, £165,000—of grants fixed under Section 2 and the amount of the fee grant. An increase of the fee grant therefore causes a corresponding increase of the grant to counties and burghs, and consequently a corresponding decrease of the residue payable as an addition to the fee grant under Sub-section 6 of Section 2. The estimate for the fee grant is framed with reference to the estimated number of scholars, but does not necessarily correspond exactly with the actual average attendance. In the estimate for 1898-99 it included a sum of £21,000 for arrears of fee grant in previous years. If this £21,000 had not been included in the Vote the grant to counties and burghs would have been less, and the residue available as an addition to the fee grant would have been increased by the same amount. There has accordingly been no over-payment under the terms of the Act to counties and burghs to the detriment of the fee grant fund, as the whole payments are automatically adjusted over a period of years.

IRELAND—ENGLISH POLICE IN DUBLIN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any members of any English police force are kept on duty in Dublin for the purpose of arresting absconding criminals or recovering stolen property; and, if so, from what source are they paid.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The answer is in the negative.

IRISH POLICE AT HOLYHEAD.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say how many absconding criminals have been arrested, and what amount of stolen property has been recovered, by the member of the Royal Irish Constabulary stationed at Holyhead since he went on duty there.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Ten absconding criminals have been arrested at Holyhead by the member of the Constabulary since he went on duty there in March, 1895, and stolen property of the value of £500 has been recovered by him.

COUNTY DOWN POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, with reference to the postal districts of Ballyroney and Katesbridge, county Down, whether he is aware that letters from England and Scotland do not reach these districts under two or three days, and letters from Bembridge, only nine miles distant from Ballyroney railway station, take nearly two days in transit, and that letters therefrom have to be sent through Rathfriland post office, and reach there too late for the cross-channel mails on same evening; and whether he will reconsider the desirability of making new arrangements by train for the accommodation of these two districts.

MR. HANBURY: As there is no second post in the day to or from Ballyroney and Katesbridge, letters sent from England and Scotland by night mail do not reach those places until the second day after posting, and letters from those places are not received in England and Scotland in time for delivery on the following morning. Returns are being taken with the view of ascertaining whether there is enough correspondence to warrant the establishment of a second post to and from Ballyroney and Katesbridge. The existing night mail service to Ballyroney and Katesbridge is performed by foot postman from Rathfriland, which in turn receives its mails by car from Newry. There are no trains by which Ballyroney and Katesbridge could be served in the morning. At present the mails reach Ballyroney at 7.5 a.m. and Katesbridge at 8.5 a.m., and are despatched from Ballyroney at 5.55 p.m. and from Katesbridge at 5 p.m. Letters posted at Banbridge (which is presumably meant, not Bembridge) in time for the mail leaving that town at 9.30 p.m. are delivered in Ballyroney and Katesbridge on the following morning.

DUBLIN SORTING OFFICE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the condition of matters in the Dublin sorting office, where, owing to the small numbers employed, there is pressure of work, and between 6,000 and 7,000 letters, etc., the correspondence of the merchants and citizens of Dublin, are mis-sent each month; whether he is aware that, owing to the present postal arrangements, the English parcel mail viâ Holyhead, reaching North Wall about 6.45 a.m., does not arrive in the parcel sorting depot until 9 or 9.30 o'clock, thus occasioning delay in delivery; that sorting clerks working under pressure and against time, in consequence of insufficient evening staff in the letter sorting department, notwithstanding, are punished with extra work if they mis-send thirty-one letters per month; and that a similar course is not followed with regard to all offenders, an official found guilty of supplying wrong records against a postman (the postman thereby being deprived of his increment and a stripe) only losing a contemplated promotion; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into the alleged grievances.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has ascertained that there is nothing unsatisfactory in the condition of the Dublin sorting office. Extra staff is provided whenever it can be foreseen that pressure of duty may require it, and arrangements are contemplated for making a small permanent addition to the numbers employed in the evening. It is not the case that anything like 6,000 or 7,000 letters a month are mis-sent. In administering punishment every case is considered on its merits, and suitable allowance is made if the conditions under which the work is done are abnormal. The Postmaster General is aware of the want of punctuality in the receipt of the morning parcel mail viâ North Wall, and he is at the present time in communication with the railway company on the subject.

COUNTY KERRY TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that inconvenience is caused in and around Cahirdaniel, county Kerry, owing to the want of telegraphic communications; and that a guarantee has been given in connection with the proposed telegraph office; and whether, in view of the fact that the fishing industry, which is of importance to that district, will be in operation during next month, immediate steps will be taken by the Post Office authorities to give the required telegraphic communications to Cahirdaniel.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is sorry that any inconvenience should arise from the lack of telegraphic communication with Cahirdaniel. He has given instructions for the extension of the telegraph to be put in hand; but the engineering staff is working under considerable pressure, and he fears he cannot promise that the work shall be completed at once.

INCOME TAX—RENTS OF LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN IRELAND.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the income tax authorities claim from the Callan Rural District Council and the Slievedaragh Rural District Council payment of income tax on the rents receivable from labourers' cottages erected under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts; and whether, as the outlay on these cottages is a loss, or at least an unprofitable investment for the time being, and that a number of years must elapse before the invested capital is recovered and any profit can accrue, he will see that the demand for income tax will not be pressed.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand that the Inland Revenue Department is quite prepared to admit that if, in the cases referred to, the interest paid to the Board of Works on money borrowed to build cottages exceeds the rents payable to the rural district council, the assessment to income tax may properly be limited to the ground rents payable by the council to the landlords, on whom the charge will fall. But before the Department can authorise this reduction of the assessments, they must have all the facts properly laid before the Surveyor of Taxes, and up to now the clerk to the rural district councils has failed to supply the necessary information. If he will remedy this omission, the matter can, I hope, be satisfactorily arranged.

CO. CORK ROAD MAINTENANCE.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that no tenders for the maintenance of five roads in the Mallow Rural District (including the streets of Mallow) have been accepted by the District Council or the County Council of Cork; in view of the fact that no moneys can be spent on the maintenance of these roads until a proposal is formulated by the district council at a quarterly meeting to be held on the 19th inst., and approved of by the county council at the quarterly meeting of that body in October next, will he state whether these roads can be handed over to the charge of the county surveyor, under Article 24 of the Procedure of Councils Order, 1899, to be maintained in the interval pending the formulation and approval of a proposal.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I understand that the failure in this case arose from the fact that a sufficient number of members to constitute a quorum was not present at the adjourned meeting of the county council on the 17th May. The Local Government Board do not consider that under the circumstances the county council can hand over the works in question to the county surveyor, as suggested.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: In the event of the next meeting having to be adjourned, which would then necessitate the matter going over till October, will the right hon. Gentleman make an order similar to that he issued last February?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of that question.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: May I ask whether, in view of the fact that this difficulty would not have arisen if the councils had possessed the power to employ direct labour on the roads, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the desirability of conferring such power on them ?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I replied to a question of the hon. Member on this subject on the 9th instant.*

WEIR ESTATE, CO. FERMANAGH.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state the cause of delay in completing the sale of the Weir estate in the county of Fermanagh; is he aware that Mrs. Alice Brown signed an agreement for purchase of her farm on this estate in April, 1896, and that, although she has several times made application to the Land Commission, and also to the solicitors for the vendors, she can get no satisfactory reply as to when the sale will be completed; and seeing that Mrs. Brown was in a position, before signing the agreement, to enter the Land Court and have a fair rent fixed, and is now paying £12 a year as interest on the purchase-money without any part of the principal being paid off till the sale is completed, will he cause inquiry to be made in this case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The estate referred to appears to consist of three holdings. The contract for the sale to Mrs. Brown of her holding was lodged in February, 1897. The advance was conditionally sanctioned in May, 1897, but the abstract of the vendor's title was not lodged until March, 1898, and in July of the same year the title was ruled defective. The defect in the title was not remedied until January last. It will be ruled and the sale completed in the usual course.

STEAMBOAT COMMUNICATION WITH GLIN, LIMERICK.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as President of the Local Government Board, if he has received a resolution from the Board of Management of the Glin (county Limerick) district school, calling attention to the urgent necessity for a means of communication by steamboat to Glin, in order to secure a proper attendance of the members who are required to come from the different unions, and to give facility to the various unions for the transit of the children, as at present they have to travel long distances by road in open cars; and whether the proposed extension of the Government steamer service from Tarbert to Foynes could be arranged so that the steamer could call at Glin, where there is a deep-water quay, to meet this requirement.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Commissioners of Public Works are already in communication with the board of management of the district school on the subject, and it is hoped that arrangements may be made to effect the object in view.

IRISH LANGUAGE IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a feeling exists in many portions of Ireland owing to the fact that the teaching of Irish is not a compulsory subject in national schools; and whether, seeing that the Kerry County Council unanimously passed a resolution asking that Irish should be made the general medium of instruction, representations will be made to the National Board with a view of giving effect to this resolution, so as to make the teaching of Irish a compulsory subject within the regular school hours.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have received a good many resolutions from public bodies in Ireland on this subject. The matter is one for the consideration of the Commissioners of National Education, and not one for the intervention of the Executive.

MR. FLAVIN: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph of my question ?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have received no representations on the subject.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Have the National Commissioners under the new rules altered the conditions as to the teaching of the Irish language in Irish elementary schools ?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman had better await the issue of the rules.

* See page 966 of this volume.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is there any "Commissioner of National Education" this House?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Commissioners have no direct representative in this House.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: When will the rules be issued?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am informed it will not be possible to issue them to-morrow, but a few copies will be available in the Vote Office for Irish Members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what his prospects are with regard to the Estimates on Friday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I had announced that after the Home Office Vote the Local Government Board Vote would be taken. I find that is now impossible, because my right hon. friend in charge of these Estimates is unable to be present. The Board of Trade Vote will therefore stand second. The Navy Estimates will be taken on Tuesday.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, W.): Will that be an allotted day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes. The reason for taking them on Tuesday next week is owing to the very great interest which is evinced in the subject of water-tube boilers. My right hon. friend the First Lord of the Admiralty has not been able to furnish the Memorandum for the use of hon. Members so early as he expected, but he thinks that no long delay in discussing the question should take place.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): When shall we have the Memorandum?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot say in the absence of my right hon. friend.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What will be the business for Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Monday I will make a statement about Ministerial business, and I shall then ask the House to suspend the Twelve o'clock rule for the remainder of the session. [AN HON. MEMBER: After wasting time on a garden party.] The Tithe Bill will be the first Order on Monday.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: As to the notice of motion standing on the Paper with reference to the Money-lending Bill, may I suggest that proceeding with that motion should be deferred until after the right hon. Gentleman's statement on Monday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that there is any reason for that. I understand that the Bill, now that the schedule has been dropped, meets with universal acceptance on both sides of the House. [Cries of "No, no!"] That is the impression I gather.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to the Land Registry (New Buildings) Bill, without amendment.

That they have passed a Bill intituled, "An Act to amend the Law relating to Lunatics in Ireland." Lunacy Regulation (Ireland) Bill [Lords].

MONEY-LENDING BILL [Lords].

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order [26th June] that the Money-lending Bill [Lords] be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., be read, and discharged; and that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, etc." — (Sir William Walrond.)

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Being a member of the Standing Committee, I would like to know whether there is any intention on the part of the Government to pass this Bill this year? If not, why should we be kept in the Committee Room dealing with it?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It is my hope that the Bill will pass. I have already stated that I understood the opposition to the Bill had to a very large extent been modified by the removal of the schedule.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said he thought the right hon. Gentleman was wholly mistaken in his estimate of the opposition to this Bill. He could not understand this motion. On the 26th June, sixteen days previously, a member of the Government, whom he saw sitting on the Front Bench, moved that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade. If he remembered rightly, the first idea was that it should go before the Standing Committee on Law, but, after consultation presumably with other members of the Government, the Secretary to the Local Government Board decided to ask that it be sent to the other Committee. There was thus a deliberative consideration on the part of the Government of the claims of the two Standing Committees to either of which the Bill might be sent, and the claim of the Standing Committee on Trade was considered to be superior. Now, there had been no attempt to explain the reasons which prevailed with the Government to induce it to refer the Bill to the Standing Committee on Law. He had, therefore, set himself to discover some reason. His first impression was that the object was possibly to save the Government from having to make the distressful announcement on Monday that this was one of the Bills which would have to be sacrificed, as undoubtedly it would have to be sooner or later this session. Then another reason which suggested itself to his mind was that the Committee on Trade had got more than it could do, while the Committee on Law had not sufficient work before it. But surely, if that were the case, it must have been known to the Government on the 26th June. He did not know whether as a matter of fact the Committee on Trade had yet entered on the consideration of the Bill. Even if it were transferred to the Committee on Law, was there any probability that it would become an Act of Parliament this session? He did not think there was, and the only effect, therefore, would be the unnecessary withdrawal from the service of the House of Members belonging to the Committee. Believing the Bill to be a bad one, he did not want to see it passed, even although the schedule was taken out of it. He therefore proposed as an Amendment that all words after "discharged" be omitted.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think that is a motion which ought to be made, seeing that its object is to destroy a Bill which has passed its Second Reading in this House.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: My real intention was to elicit some explanation from the Government of the action they are taking. I should like to know whether the reasons I have advanced are correct or not. Still, if the Amendment is not in order I will not move it.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The fact is the Bill was originally referred to the Standing Committee on Trade under the idea that the Companies Bill would not take so long as it has done. The Committee, however, has only got to Clause 12 of that Bill, whereas the Law Committee is practically clear for work; and there is no reason why the latter should not take up the Money-lending Bill, and so give the Bill a chance which it would hardly have if it remained before the Committee on Trade.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I protest strongly against the extraordinary want of consideration shown by the Government for the Standing Committee. Why was not this motion made a week ago? The Standing Committee was actually called together to discuss a measure about Sunday Closing in Wales which the First Lord of the Treasury had previously announced to the House to be as dead as mutton. Then the Committee had another meeting, at which no work was done. I do think that more consideration should have been shown by the Government. These Committees do admirable work; in fact they do the greater part of the work of the House by knocking Bills into shape, and they are, therefore, entitled to have some consideration shown them.

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I merely rise to point out a matter which seems to be escaping the attention of the House, namely, that these two Committees are not merely co-ordinate Committees, but according to the Standing Orders they are appointed and constituted to deal with distinct branches of legislation. One is called into existence to deal with Bills which relate to law, the Courts of Justice and legal proceedings, while the other has to deal with trade, shipping, manufactures, agriculture and fishing. Therefore, although the line of demarcation may sometimes be very narrow, the House must not get into the habit of moving Bills indifferently from one Committee to another according to the chances of success.

MR. DILLON: As a point of order, may I ask whether the effect of the Amendment of the hon. Member for King's Lynn would not really be not to destroy the Bill, but to leave the Bill in the position it occupied before the Motion to refer the Bill to the Committee on Trade was passed?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is quite right. I was for the moment misled by the observation of the hon. Member for King's Lynn himself when he said that to stop the further progress of the Bill he would move this. The true effect would be to leave the Bill to the Committee of the whole House. I quite agree, therefore, that, strictly speaking, it is not out of order, and that being so, I will accept the Amendment.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Then I will move it. I do not think that I need repeat what I have said in support of it.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'discharged,' to the end of the Question."—(Mr. Gibson Bowles.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I should be sorry to find myself compelled to go into the opposite Lobby to my hon. friend, and I therefore hope he will be satisfied with the discussion which has taken place and with the explanations that have been given, and will withdraw his Amendment. I think that this is one of the few non-mischievous Bills which this House has had an opportunity of considering, and it would be a pity if, on the grounds he has stated, it should not have a fair chance of passing. I feel some difficulty in supporting the reference to a Standing Committee, because I think such committees are most objectionable institutions. I have always opposed them, and I originally did so in conjunction with my political friends, who now take the opposite course. As my hon. friend appears to have very slight hope of this Bill passing under any conditions, I would suggest that he should not press the matter to a division.

The House divided:—Ayes, 228; Noes, 61. (Division List No. 211.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Order [26th June] that the Money-lending Bill [Lords] be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc., be read, and discharged; and that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, etc.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), further considered.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): The Amendment which I am now moving must be considered with three others which follow and which are consequential. The purpose of the Amendment is to save this very useful and important clause from becoming, I fear, an absolutely dead letter. I am quite sure that as it stands, it will be impossible to obtain any useful result from it, and I am even doubtful whether the language I am proposing is sufficient to meet the difficulty. According to the doctrine of Chancery penal rents cannot be enforced when they appear in the form of penal rents. But, unfortunately, by a series of decisions so firmly fixed for years that it is hopeless to attempt to disturb them, that doctrine has been practically nullified. If the penal rent, for instance, is expressed in the form that the rent of £200 shall become £300 in the last year of the tenancy, if the way-going crop is sold off the farm, it may well be that Chancery will not enforce it. But if the lease provides that the rent in the last year of the tenancy is to be £300 to be reduced to £200 if the way-going crop is not sold, that great Court allows itself to be hoodwinked by the form of the clause and fails to see that it means precisely the same as the clause I first referred to, and I regard it as a valid and enforceable clause. This form of provision in a lease will not be touched by the Bill if the clause we are discussing stands in the form it is at present, so that it will be open to any conveyancing clerk, in drawing a contract of tenancy, to avoid the provisions of the clause, and make penal rents just as much enforceable as at present by merely using the affirmative form rather than the negative. By that simple turn of a sentence, the whole action of the clause can be avoided. In order to escape the incidence of these decisions, it will of course be necessary to draft the clause very carefully to show that it is the intention of the Legislature that by no form or device of conveyancing can penal rents be enforced. The language which I propose, and which is contained in this and the subsequent Amendments is as follows—

"Notwithstanding any provision or exception in a contract of tenancy relating to the payment by the tenant of an increased rent or liquidated damages or any other penal consequences for a breach of a covenant or non-compliance with a condition," the landlord shall not be entitled to recover any sum in excess of the damage actually suffered by him. I do not think that the words I propose are too wide. We have not to consider forfeiture for breach of conditions. This class of penal provision, which is the most important, was settled by Earl Cairns' Act in 1881. All we have now to consider is that the clause should prevent exaggerated money payment for a breach of conditions. In other words, we have to make this clause adhere to the great English principle that if a man makes a breach of contract, the other party is adequately compensated by the full damages following on that breach. This principle is a most just one. The clause does not take from the landlord the power to recover full and ample damages for breach of contract; all it says is that a contract of tenancy shall not be based on the principle that a man may get a profit out of a breach of contract—that is to say, that he can recover damages out of all proportion to the damage that he has suffered. I cannot but think that the object of the Amendment will be sympathised with on both sides of the House. The presence of the clause in the Act shows that the Government have the intention not only in form, but in substance, to get rid of these penal consequences. For the reasons which I have given to the House it is necessary that the clause should be drafted in a very wide way. I have no special affection for the language I propose, but it appears to me that if we adhere at all to the form of that clause, that language is the best. Of course if the Government acknowledge that their object is the same as mine, and that it is their intention that penal rents in any form shall not be enforceable, I have no desire that these particular words should be accepted. If I may express my own opinion, I think that the point being one of great difficulty, the best course for the Government to pursue would be to have a new clause drawn up with due regard to the decisions which have been given. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 1, after the word 'provision,' to insert the words 'or exception.'"—(Mr. Moulton.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or exception' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I am sure the House will thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for the great clearness and the temperate manner with which he has dealt with this question. The principle which the hon. and learned Gentleman has in view is one to which the Government have no objection. At the same time, I share the misgiving of the hon. and learned Gentleman as to whether the words on the Paper are quite adequate to carry out the purpose intended. The words which are on the Paper as to "any other penal consequences" might be held to include—at all events it might be argued that they included, the right of re-entrance. Is is perfectly true, as was pointed out by my hon. and learned friend, that the provisions of Lord Cairns' Act limited the right of re-entry, and it might be said that these words would put an end to the right of re-entry altogether. Under these circumstances the Government will carefully consider the matter before the Bill reaches Committee stage in another place.

*MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.) hoped that the Attorney General would make it clear whether the Government, in accepting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Launceston, meant to make the penal clauses in regard to breaking up permanent pasture, grubbing underwoods or felling, cutting, lopping, or injuring trees, inoperative.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say so, I never stated that I would accept the Amendment in reference to the concluding words of the clause.

*MR. STRACHEY said that when the Government introduced the Bill it did not allow the landlord to introduce any penal clauses in their contracts of tenancy; and it was necessary to have a distinct understanding on this point, because, while it was quite right to enact that only certain penal rents should be operative, it was not right to give permission in certain cases to impose penal rents, and then by insertion of certain words to make those rents voidable, as the Amendment would do. The Government were playing fast and loose.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): The hon. Gentleman has shown clearly that he does not understand the clause as it stands, the Amendment of my hon. and learned friend, or the Bill as introduced by the Government. He has entirely misrepresented all three, and has stated broadly to the House that it was intended by the Government to sanction the breaking up of permanent pasture.

*MR. STRACHEY: The right hon. Gentleman entirely misrepresents me.

*MR. LONG: If that is not what the right hon. Gentleman intended to say, then I do not understand the point of his reference to penal clauses.

*MR. STRACHEY: What I said was that the Government in the first place, by their Bill as introduced, prohibited all penal rents, even for breaking up permanent pasture. In the Standing Committee on Trade the Government, under pressure, had to move, and carried, an Amendment allowing penal rents in the case of breaking up permanent pasture without consent of the landlord. Now the Government, if they accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Launceston, will be undoing what they did in the Standing Committee, for the hon. Member, in moving his Amendment, stated that its object was to make the penal rents inoperative.

*MR. LONG: The view the Government took was fully explained in Committee upstairs. It was that the landlord, in the case of permanent pasture being broken up, could recover from the tenant as for an act of waste, and that the insertion of a penal clause did not strengthen his position. It was pointed out by the hon. and learned Member for Launceston that the effect of the clause in the Bill as it stands would not be such as the Government desire, that a coach and four might be driven through it, and that a penal clause might be made outside it. In order to prevent that the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed words which my right hon. and learned friend the Attorney General has accepted in spirit, in order that the words in the clause may do exactly what the Government desire them to do, neither less nor more.

*MR. MOULTON: I am quite satisfied with the assurance given, and ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): I would hardly have ventured to trouble the House with the Amendment standing in my name on the matter of penal rents were it not that in this clause there is a rather vicious principle which deserves consideration. On the face of it, the clause would appear to intervene in contracts of tenancy now existing, and which have still seven or eight years to run. If that is so, it would break up these contracts and set up a new state of things. I think that is rather a dangerous principle to introduce into an Act of Parliament. The purpose of my Amendment is to safeguard existing contracts, and leave the operation of the clause to contracts made after the passing of the Act. I hope my Amendment will be accepted. I think it would be a great pity if the progress of the Bill, which, on the whole, has proceeded on very moderate lines, should be arrested by embarking on a principle of a revolutionary character, and which would subvert the rights of property, which the President of the Board of Agriculture should be the very first person to safeguard.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 1, after the word 'tenancy,' to insert the words 'made after the passing of this Act.'"—(Lord Hugh Cecil.)

*MR. LONG: I do not at all wonder that the noble Lord has found it necessary to call attention to the operation of the clause. It is undoubtedly true, as he has stated, that it makes a serious breach in the existing law in regard to contracts already made. I hope I shall be able to show the House some good grounds for the course the Government have adopted, and I trust that my noble friend and others who, like myself, attach great importance to the preservation of existing contracts, will acknowledge that except in name and in a technical sense it can hardly be said that this clause will involve the serious results which my noble friend fears. What are those so-called penal rents which the Government wish by this clause to abolish? First, let me point out that by the exception to which reference has already been made those penal clauses which are abolished refer only to what I may call the tenant's cultivation of the soil as opposed to any act of agriculture which would interfere with the character of the holding. We have separated these two matters in all that we have proposed in the Bill. At the present time in regard to a great many of these penal clauses, we find, from the evidence of the most experienced valuers, that they are disregarded by the valuers because they consider them inoperative and unjust. What is the object of these penal clauses? It is not, I submit, to give the landlord power to recover against the tenant, but to enable him to prevent the tenant from indulging in certain practices which the landlord believes, and probably rightly, will result in great permanent damage, or at any rate in a serious change in the character of his property. Now this result has followed—that although the land has been maintained in proper condition, and damage has been avoided, when the ultimate settlement between landlord and tenant has to be made, these penal clauses have been suddenly dug out of obscurity, as it were, and have been held against the tenant in such a way as has led the tenant not only to lose the compensation for the improvements which everybody admits he has made on his farm, but to his actually being mulcted in damages over and above his own claim, because he has been guilty of a breach of contract covered by a penal clause. There was a case the other day in which the tenant had so far improved the value of his holding that the rent was actually raised from thirty-five shillings to £8 per acre, but by doing so he had brought himself within the law because he had broken a penal clause. The result was that, although the land was improved in value to the extent I have named, not only did he lose the compensation due to him for unexhausted improvements, but he was mulcted in heavy damages besides. In the first place these penal clauses are very often discouraged and disregarded by the valuers, and not only are they disregarded, but when their validity is admitted, they very frequently result in manifest injustice to the tenant. What would be the result if this Amendment were carried? It would lull the landlord into a false sense of security by giving him protection which is protection only in name. It would not protect him against the injury done to his property by the tenant. In all these discussions upon the question of land legislation proposals have been made from each side of the House pressing for drastic reforms. On both sides of the House reasons have been adduced to show that great and permanent injury would result to the land unless those proposals were admitted; but one claim has been universally admitted, and that is that the tenants within proper limits should have absolute freedom in the cultivation of his land. There is no freedom to cultivate the land if these penal clauses are retained and held in terrorem over the head of the tenant, who knows that if he indulges in freedom of cultivation he will have to pay for it when he leaves. I submit that the Government have been justified in the course they have taken in regard to this particular question, and I hope the House will support us.

*EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.) said that this was not a point upon which he felt very strongly, but he thought the fact that these penal clauses were now in abeyance, because the arbitrators did not think fit to enforce them, was no argument for doing away with them. The precedent of changing the law because people did not pay attention to their statutory obligations was a very bad one, and ought not to be made. He thought the argument that the penal clauses were not essential to the interests of the landlords, and they did inflict an injustice on the tenants, was true, and it was a good argument against penal clauses, but no argument at all for breaking contracts which the tenant had entered into with his eyes open. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture was rather severe on the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire a few days previously because he explained that tenants, as a rule, were people who were not capable of looking after their own interests, but it was only on that principle that this clause was defensible or excusable. He did not think where a tenant entered into a contract with full knowledge it was desirable to allow him to break it. The right hon. Gentleman might very well accept the Amendment, because, after all, it dealt with a very small number of cases. Of all the decisions given upon agricultural questions only 5 per cent. came under the operation of this Bill, and of that 5 per cent. there was a considerable number of yearly tenancies which would not be affected by the operation of this clause. Under those circumstances, he thought the right hon. Gentleman might have accepted the Amendment. At the same time, having regard to the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, he should advise his noble friend to withdraw it.

*MR. MOULTON said he could not help feeling great relief when he heard that the Government were going to insist upon the clause. Upon the defence of the clause he did not intend to add a word to what had been already said. All he desired to do was to say a word as to the course the right hon. Gentleman proposed to follow. So far from his proposal being revolutionary, as some hon. Gentlemen had suggested, it was simply a continuation of a process which had been going on for centuries, by which the English law was shaking itself free from the odious task of enforcing penal clauses. Gradually all these penalties and forfeitures were being done away with, a great many of them by the Conveyancing Act of 1887, passed by Earl Cairns, who was too conservative ever to be revolutionary in the least degree. With respect to this clause being applied to existing contracts, of which the noble Lord seemed to be afraid, he desired to point out that in every step taken up to the present the change had been made to apply to existing contracts. It was so in Earl Cairns Act, and in this case they need have no fear in so doing.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, N.R., Holderness) thought it was rather difficult for hon. Gentlemen who were now urging the passage of the Money-lending Bill through the House to complain of this principle being applied to existing contracts. He was not a very earnest advocate of the Money-lending Bill, but many of those who sat around him were anxious to see it passed into law, and he had not heard any of them express a regret that that was to apply to existing contracts. In the part of the country from which he came they did not know much of these penal rents, but he was inclined to think it was better not to interfere with existing contracts when it could be avoided, and if it were true that these penal clauses in agreements were so exceedingly rare that nobody knew very much about them, he thought the Amendment might have been accepted.

*SIR W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford) said the discussion showed that there was little need for harsh legislation, and he trusted the noble Lord would not press the matter to a division. It was the evil days through which agriculture had passed which had rendered such legislation unnecessary. But, as the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill had pointed out, only 5 per cent. of the agricultural tenants would come under this Amendment, and the majority of those would not require to be dealt with. He knew of no landlord who would interfere with a good tenant, and he did not believe such a man existed; but he went further, and said if such a landlord did exist he ought to be relegated to the county asylum.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LOPES (Grantham): In moving the Amendment which stands in my name, perhaps I may be allowed first of all to remind the House what took place in the Standing Committee on this question. On that occasion an Amendment was moved by the hon. Member for South Somerset which would have had the effect of increasing the limit of the law of distress from one to two years. That Amendment was withdrawn, and an Amendment was proposed by the Member for South Kensington similar to that which I now propose. My right hon. friend the Minister for Agriculture, speaking to the Amendment, said that he had a perfectly open mind upon the question, and that he would be prepared to accept the decision of the Committee. The Committee divided on the question, and there were fifteen who voted in favour of the retention of the clause and fourteen against. I can only hope that the small majority of one which my right hon. friend obtained on that occasion will not hermetically seal his mind with regard to the question, and that he will be prepared if possible to accept my Amendment, and, at any rate, I think it will be a justification for me in bringing the matter up. The Amendment I propose is obviously to amend the law as it at present exists under the Act of 1883. Prior to that the law of distress was a considerable bone of contention throughout the country. It was frequently discussed in the House, and a Select Committee was appointed in 1882. The result of that Committee was that Section 44 of the Act of 1883 was passed. Under that section the landlord's power regarding distress was limited to one year, but there was a proviso to this effect—that where in the ordinary course of dealing between the landlord and the tenant of a holding the rent of such holding had been allowed to be deferred until the expiration of a year or half of a year, the law would be that the rent of that holding should be deemed to have become due at the expiration of that quarter or half-year, as the case might be, and not the date at which it became legally due. It is easy to lose one's self in the intricate maze of Parliamentary phraseology, but I do not think there can be any doubt as to what the intention of the Legislature was at that time. It meant to safeguard the landlord's interest where it was the custom to allow three or six months grace to the tenant in the payment of his rent. That has been the practice ever since that Act was passed, and the present Bill proposes to do away with that compromise, for it was a compromise, which was arrived at by both parties in the State on that occasion, and if this clause becomes law it will only allow the landlord to distrain for one year's rent. I must say that it does not seem to me very difficult to understand why this clause has found its way into the Bill. It is impossible to say at the present time that the law of distress embodies any principle of injustice. It is used with the greatest toleration, the greatest forbearance, and the greatest discretion by landlords and their agents, and although it may be said that it is very seldom made use of, to admit that is not to admit that it is either useless or unnecessary, because, while at the same time it allows a landlord to give the greatest possible latitude and the greatest credit to a good tenant, it also enables him to deal with a tenant who cannot be so described. I would say at once that I do not consider this to be at all a landlords' question. It is simply and entirely a tenants' question, and it is as such that I venture to press it upon the attention of the House. The exercise of the law of distress at the present time, when it is exercised at all, is chiefly in the direction of giving relief to the tenant, and I venture to say that a large body of tenants throughout the country would be dismayed at any limitation of the landlord's power of distress, because such limitation would mean that it would limit the landlord's readiness to give them credit at the time when they require it. Although it may be said that if you diminish the law of distraint you will increase the power of the tenant to get credit from tradesmen, my answer to that is that the law of competition itself will enable him to get reasonable and fair latitude in this direction from tradespeople, and it is far better for him to borrow money from his landlord than to apply to a bank or any other source whatsoever. I believe that, so far from simplifying the relations between landlord and tenant, the effect of this limitation would be to promote discord between the two parties. It would tend to create an unnecessary revolution in the arrangement that at present exists between them which would be prejudicial to both of the parties concerned. I do not want to weary the House by giving very many instances of what might arise if this clause was passed as it now stands, but I should like to point out three cases at least in which it would inflict very serious injury upon the tenant. Let me take the instance of a farmer who pays £100 a year in rent to his landlord by half-yearly payments—in December for the Michaelmas rent and in June for the Lady Day rent. Supposing that, at the June collection for Lady Day, he is £75 in arrear with his rent, it is obviously impossible that the landlord could allow the tenant to go on another six months if this clause was passed, because then he would have exhausted the limit under which he would be allowed to recover, and, therefore, to obviate such a risk as this it would be necessary to make the rent audit close up to the term day. This in many parts of the country would have a disastrous result on the tenants themselves, because rents are collected at such times as to permit the tenants to have the opportunity of attending the local fairs which are held in their neighbourhood. To make any alteration in the arrangements for the payment of their rents would, therefore, have a most injurious effect upon them. Then, upon every property there are instances of tenant farmers who have been occupying their farms for upwards of thirty or forty years on what are known as yearly tenancies. It has been the custom with them——

MR. LONG signified to the hon. Member that he would accept the Amendment.

MR. LOPES: I am told that my right hon. friend is prepared to accept the Amendment, and that being so, I shall not continue my remarks.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 11, to leave out Clause 7." —(Mr. Lopes.)

Question proposed, "That the words of the clause to the word 'more,' in line 12, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: I should like to tell the House why I propose to accept this Amendment. My hon. friend has asked why it is that the Government should put this Amendment in the Bill. The question of the law of distress is a complicated and difficult one. I have no doubt my hon. friend's interpretation of the Act of 1883 is correct, but it certainly was understood at that time that the power of the landlord to recover under the law of distress was to be limited to a year's rent. When it was discovered that a year's rent meant in reality practically eighteen months rent, it was still held that that was intended by the Act of Parliament to mean a year's rent, and that the landlord was entitled to recover for that period. There have been several suggestions made on the subject. The Royal Commission recommended that it should be limited to a year, and therefore the Government thought it right to put this clause in the Bill, but since doing so we have received representations from many quarters, and many of them from hon. Members sitting on the other side of the House, pointing out to us that the effect of this change in the law would be distinctly injurious to the tenants themselves, especially in cases where the properties are held not by single individuals in their own right, but where they are held by trustees on behalf of charities, colleges, and other institutions. It was stated that the result of any such change in the law would be distinctly injurious to the tenant farmers. My hon. friend opposite who represents one of the Divisions of Somerset proposed in the Grand Committee upstairs not that the law should remain as it is, but that the period should be definitely extended to two years. As my hon. friend the Member for Grantham has pointed out, the cutting out of this clause was only defeated by a majority of one. I voted for the retention of the clause, but I left it entirely to the Committee to decide it as they liked. Since then I have been assured in many quarters that the retention of this clause would be injurious to the tenants, and that being so, I advise the House to accept the Amendment my hon. friend has moved for the dropping of this clause out of the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Remaining words of the clause omitted.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.) said the Amendment he desired to move dealt with Clause 8, and its effect was to make Section 28 of Part III. of the Schedule retrospective.

*MR. LONG rose to a point of order. Clause 8, to which the Amendment was addressed, dealt only with the method by which compensation was to be obtained. He submitted the Amendment should properly come on the schedule itself.

*MR. SPEAKER ruled that the Amendment was in order and in its proper place

MR. JEFFREYS said the point was that compensation was given in the schedule for temporary pasture, and the farmer would like that to be retrospective. That was the only question he desired to raise, and for that purpose he moved the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 20, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'provided that, in the case of an improvement such as is described in paragraph twenty-eight in Part III. of the First Schedule to this Act, where any such improvement has been carried out within three years before the determination of the tenancy, compensation may be claimed and obtained under the provisions of this Act.'"—(Mr. Jeffreys.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. There was not an argument in support of making the Bill retrospective in regard to this particular point which could not with equal force be advanced in regard to many other improvements. There was really not much importance to be attached to the inclusion of temporary seeds. As a matter of practice, the farmer who laid down pasture did so knowing, in the first place, that as the law stood he had no right to compensation, and, in the second place, that if he quitted while that temporary pasture was in it would be to the advantage of the owner of the land to take it over rather than to allow the farmer to break it up, as he would have full right to do if the owner would not take it over. Therefore the point was not so great as it at first sight might appear. It would not be fair or wise to make an exception in any particular instance; if the measure was made retrospective at all it ought to be made generally retrospective, and that the Government could not agree to.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment made.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.) said that in putting down the motion to omit Clause 10, he desired to call attention to a matter which had been brought up on several occasions—namely, the position in which Scottish agriculturists were placed by the way in which this measure applied to them. This was a totally new departure. Hitherto, in regard to this important subject, Scotland had had its own system of legislation perfectly separate from the English system, and it was desired that in the future they should proceed upon the same lines as in the past, having separate legislation on this subject, so that Scottish agriculture could continue to develop on the lines which had led to such marked progress since the beginning of the century. He did not say that the Scottish legislation should not be on the same lines as the English. The progress of agriculture must necessarily move very largely upon the same principles and the same lines in both countries. But as a matter of good administration and good legislation, the Government, in this Bill, and particularly in the clause under discussion, were taking a retrograde step. Instead of making legislation easier and simpler for the ordinary person to understand, and for the Scottish tenant and landlord to have their grievances remedied and their differences settled, it became more difficult and expensive, because, in addition to their own Acts, this Bill under discussion would come in, and that had to be interpreted by means not only of Scottish Acts but also of English Acts. By this measure the Government were taking a retrograde step both as regards legislation and administration, and for that reason he moved the omission of Clause 10.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 4, line 26, to leave out Clause 10." —(Mr. Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*Mr. LONG said he was not overwhelmed by the charge which had frequently been made in the course of the debates that the action of the Government was either retrograde or injurious to the best interests of agriculture. Nobody admired more than those on this side of the Border the energetic and enlightened manner in which Scottish agriculturists had carried on their business; but at the same time there was a place called England in which were a large number of competent agriculturists who could hold their own in competition even with Scotchmen. The views expressed by the hon. Member were entirely at variance with the views held by those who had some claim to represent Scottish agriculture—by such a body, for instance, as the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture. That body was probably quite as much entitled to consideration on this question as the hon. Member, and he (the speaker) was justified in putting their views forward in answer to those of the hon. Member. The Scottish Chamber of Agriculture had petitioned Parliament in favour of the Bill; they had held a meeting at which they welcomed the Bill as one of much importance, containing provisions calculated to give more effective force to the compensation principle; and oddly enough, the provision empowering the Board of Agriculture to appoint an arbitrator, which had been condemned by the hon. Member, was one of the parts of the Bill to which they attached special importance. It therefore did not look as if that body shared the rather peculiar views of the hon. Gentleman in regard to the Board of Agriculture. It was not desirable or necessary to debate on this Amendment the whole question of whether or not the Bill should apply to Scotland. The object of the Government was so far as necessary to amend the law as applied to both countries, and gradually to consolidate the whole of the agricultural laws into one Act, so that it would be easy for anyone, whether in England, Scotland, or Wales, to ascertain what the law was and how it stood.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Buchanan and Sir William Wedderburn.

*MR. SPEAKER: The House having just affirmed the machinery for applying the Act to Scotland, the next Amendment, standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire, providing that the clause shall not apply to Scotland, is out of order.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): The Amendment which stands in my name is to encourage the construction of cottages for agricultural labourers. In the district which it is my privilege to represent there is a very great want of accommodation for agricultural labourers; in fact, it has become a social scandal that there is no proper accommodation for them. I think the Member for East Aberdeenshire brought before the House a number of cases of very great hardship which had happened in both his constituency and mine, where the sanitary inspector, having visited the cottages of agricultural labourers, finds that they must be condemned on sanitary grounds. But the sanitary inspectors are in a great difficulty, because the cottages, if condemned, would probably be pulled down, and no others put in their place, in which case the position of the labourers would be worse than before. This is not only a very great scandal, but a very serious obstacle to good farming throughout the district. The labourers very often have to walk many miles to get to their work. It must also be remembered that an agricultural labourer cannot be made in a day, for he must serve his apprenticeship, and these hardy crofters make the very best material for agricultural labourers. In the Report of the Royal Commission on Agriculture various reasons were given why farmers are not able to contend with farmers abroad, and one of the principal was because of the increased cost of production, and because they could not get good labour. Farmers are perfectly willing to pay for good labour, but they cannot get it, one of the chief reasons being that there is no adequate accommodation for labourers. What I therefore propose is that cottages for agricultural labourers should be taken out of Part I. of the schedule of improvements which require the consent of the landlord, and put into Part II., in which the farmer is only required to give notice. It must be remembered that a great many of these farmers have leases for twenty-one years, and it is perfectly certain that no farmer would spend money in building cottages unless they were absolutely necessary for the conduct of his farm. We have been told by the right hon. Gentleman and others that the farmers are very capable of knowing their true interests, and I do not see how their true interests in this matter differ from the true interests of the landlords.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6 (First Schedule), line 5, after the word 'buildings,' to insert the words 'except cottages for agricultural labourers.'" — (Sir William Wedderburn.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: I can hardly imagine that the hon. Member will insist on this Amendment, because I am convinced it is not in the least desired. The first great demand—probably a stronger and greater demand than any other—which the labourers make is that that they should hold their cottages independent of farmers and direct from the landlords, and that their cottages should not be part and parcel of the farms on which they are engaged. I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman how he proposes to carry out the Amendment. Supposing a labourer does not desire to live in a cottage on the farm, is the farmer to bear the cost of that cottage, which no one will occupy, and is the landlord to be compelled to buy it without having been consulted in the first instance as to the number of rooms, the site and whether it was wanted or not. From the point of view of the landlord and the labourer, I cannot conceive that there would be any advantage in this proposal. As for the farmer I think it will be found that he is not inclined to lay out capital when he can only expect a return of 1½ per cent. at the utmost. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member will not persist in the Amendment.

MR. BUCHANAN: With regard to the argument on behalf of the landlord, surely if the cottages which a tenant puts up do not add to the letting value of the farm, then there would be no claim for compensation. The right hon. Gentleman says that they may be useless cottages and not wanted, but in that case he tenant would not be entitled to compensation. The substance of the Amendment of my hon. friend is to provide for the cottage accommodation which experience has shown exists in many parts of Scotland. Very often in Scotland, especially where the tenants are a more enterprising body of men than the landlords, they are quite willing to put capital into the development of their farms, and one way of developing a farm is to provide accommodation for labourers. My hon. friend in his Amendment wishes to remove a restriction on enterprising tenants who desire to improve their farms in that way.

Question put, and negatived.

*EARL PERCY: I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name, and will do so very briefly, as I have already stated my views on the subject. This Bill for the first time proposes to allow a tenant to make gardens, orchards, and osier beds not exceeding three acres in all without the consent of the landlord. I propose to leave out the words "exceeding one acre" in order to bring the law back to the state in which it now exists. The principle of the Act of 1883 was that improvements for which the tenant might gain compensation without the consent of the landlord were to be strictly limited to those absolutely necessary for the cultivation of the soil. The tenant has entered into a legal obligation to farm the soil to the best of his ability, and he can only do so if allowed a certain amount of latitude in the selection of appliances which his experience tells him are best fitted for the capacity of the soil. But in this Bill the principle is adopted that a tenant is to be allowed to convert an agricultural holding to other purposes, and in that manner to try experiments. You are introducing a principle which is wholly indefensible and which lends itself to indefinite extension. The tenant has entered on the holding with full knowledge of its character and the conditions attaching to its cultivation. If he does not like that character and those conditions he is at perfect liberty to go elsewhere. It might be said that this is a small point. Of course, it is a small point in itself. It may also be said that in one or two parts of the country we may have cantankerous landlords, who will refuse to allow a small indulgence to their tenants, and that it is therefore the duty of the Legislature to step in and remove that hardship. It is these hard cases which, in my opinion, make bad law. I do not see why you should stop short at legislation which would deprive the landlord of all control over his land once he has leased it to a tenant. It may be said that three acres are a very small slice out of an ordinary farm, but the right hon. Gentleman must remember that many of the farms dealt with under this Bill are farms of five, ten, fifteen, or twenty acres, and three acres is a considerable slice in such cases. It is a monstrous thing that we should allow tenants who have only a temporary interest in a holding to convert it from an agricultural holding to purposes for which the soil may be absolutely unfitted, and for the produce of which there might be no local sale, and then to come to the landlord and ask for compensation. What would be thought if we were to apply this principle to the ordinary practice of letting houses? What would be said if the right hon. Gentleman were to let his house to me at an ordinary rent and I were to convert his drawing-room into a gymnasium and his dining-room into a theatre, and then ask him for compensation on the ground that the theatrical entertainments had added to the value of the house. That is precisely an analogous case. If you allow these tenants to make these gardens and osier beds why confine them to one acre; why place any restriction upon them at all? Personally, I think the whole proposal is ludicrous and unnecessary. If the gardens are likely to increase the value of the holding, then clearly the landlord, who has not merely a temporary interest in the land, will give facilities to the tenant to make them. The proposal in the Bill is therefore unnecessary. If you are going to introduce this principle where are you going to stop. It is practically certain that when you propose to confine this new licence to tenants to one acre the party opposite will certainly propose to extend it still further when they come into power. I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it is not contended that there is any great demand for this proposal. It is admitted it has been framed to meet possible or casual cases of hardship; it would bring no popularity to this side of the House, and it has nothing to do with the simplification of procedure which is the main object of the Bill. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will think twice before he introduces a principle into the Bill which in future will enable the party opposite to claim an acceptance of a development of that principle for which the right hon. Gentleman or any of his colleagues would not have any sympathy at all.

Earl Percy.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 8, to leave out the words 'exceeding one acre.'"—(Earl Percy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: It is useless to deny that the proposal to give this power to the tenants is a limitation in some degree of the principle that has been more than once laid down—namely, that the right should be preserved to the landlord to deal with any ultimate change in the character of a farm as he thinks best. What my noble friend has said is undoubtedly true, but I am bound to say, when he expresses inability to draw a distinction between one acre and ten acres, I am doubtful whether he has not studied more carefully the logical aspect of these cases rather than their practical aspects. I can assure my noble friend that farmers fully realise why a distinction is drawn at one acre. Logically, from my noble friend's point of view, the limitation may be a very improper one, but from the general point of view, it is a very proper and sensible proceeding. It is the limitation in Part I. that leads to the absence of limitation in Part II. of the schedule. My noble friend moves to omit these words in order to follow up his Amendment by moving to omit other words in the next part of the schedule. Therefore it is necessary that I should point out to the House that the power which it is proposed that the tenants should acquire under Part II. is limited in this way. If the tenant desires to do this work, he must give notice to his landlord, and if the landlord desires to do the work himself, he has not only the right to do it, but has statutory power to charge the tenant 5 per cent. That is a great protection to the landlords. I entirely agree with my noble friend that this is a very small matter indeed, and that there is not a very great demand for it. So far as I am aware, no great interest is taken in it by landlords or tenants outside the House of Commons. It has been recommended by the Central Chamber of Agriculture and also by the Royal Commission. Supported as it is by these two recommendations, I do not think it can be regarded as a dangerous power to confer on the tenants. I cannot help hoping that the House will retain these powers, because they will be useful to farmers who desire to exercise them, and I do not think there will be any danger in giving them.

Mr. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): The question we have to consider is whether a tenant farmer to whom land is let for the purpose of cultivation should be allowed to take a considerable portion of the holding and apply it to purposes not contemplated when his agreement was entered into, and which I think it is impossible to argue would be in the interests of good farming. Can my right hon. friend say that agriculture will be improved or the tenant's position amended by speculations of this kind? It is absolutely a new business—business which I undertake to say tenant farmers know nothing about, and in my opinion it would be a very foolish thing for them to embark on it. I do not know whether my right hon. friend can tell me of any case in which a farmer has done well by dabbling in such speculations. I think the principle we are now asked to establish is most mischievous and undesirable. As regards the general subject, my right hon. friend has not noticed my noble friend's strongest point—namely, that the relative proportion of these experiments to the area of the holding is not defined. I can imagine anyone saying that three acres would be a mere nothing on a farm of 1,000 acres; but how about small farms? Three acres would be, relatively speaking, a large portion of a small holding, and it is a very strong proposal to divert it from the purpose for which the land was let. An acre of land is a great deal to till as a garden. Of course if a tenant intends to go in for market gardening he ought to apply to the landlord as a market gardening tenant. As for orchards, I have some slight experience of them, and I can only say it is a very wearisome thing to have to wait until the trees grow. I say we are doing an ill turn to the tenant farmers by inviting them to embark upon speculative enterprises of this kind. I do hope, especially, that my right hon. friend will not commit himself to the osier beds. He will see that there is a vital distinction between a farmer wanting a few rows of potatoes or a small quantity of fruit for home consumption and the planting of osier beds. He should remember that osier beds, unless protected by fences, would be of serious injury to the farm. Perhaps a portion of a field may be unduly moist, and the farmer, instead of taking any trouble to relieve it of its waterlogged condition, would decide under the Act of Parliament to plant osiers. He would get over the trouble of making the land drier, and could also claim compensation. That would be most mischievous. Has my right hon. friend contemplated what the estimated cost would be of planting an acre of osiers and fencing the same? I think it would be found that quarrels would arise in the exercise of this power, and as to whether osier beds would add to the letting value of the holding, that would be a moot point. It cannot be seriously considered that the planting of these beds is likely to benefit the tenant farmers of England, and I hope my noble friend will take the sense of the House on the proposal.

Mr. JEFFREYS could not see that the planting of an orchard could injure a farm. As a matter of fact, if it did not turn out a success the only man who would be injured was the man who had taken the risk. It was absurd to say that a farmer could not even plant an acre of fruit trees without getting the consent of the landlord. It should be remembered that this was only in the second schedule, and the tenant could not do the planting without giving notice to the landlord, when the landlord might prevent him from carrying out the alteration. This modest proposal was made by the Royal Commission, and he thought it would be very wrong not to pass it. He lived in a dry country, and did not know much about osier beds, but if a farmer planted osier beds on soil which was not suitable or damp enough, and they turned out a failure, he would get no compensation.

*Captain PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge) hoped his noble friend would press his Amendment to a division; for, after all, there was an important principle at stake—namely, the alteration of the permanent character of a holding without the consent of the landlord. His hon. friend said that drainage was more important than this particular class of improvement; but the question was, did the improvement alter the character of the holding? Now, draining did not alter the character of the holding, and, what was of more importance, it was beyond dispute a class of improvement which would be of equal use to the succeeding as to the present tenant. On the other hand, if osiers were planted it would probably be done by a man who was a basket maker. But the successor might not be a basket maker, and could not make use of the osiers, and he would go to the wall. But there was another important point, the landlord might be an extremely poor man himself. In the case of large farms, cultivated by large tenants, an acre taken up for an orchard or an osiery would not be a matter of great importance. But in the case of a small holding a comparatively large sum of money might be spent in laying out two acres of land as a fruit garden and an osiery. These might not be of any great value to the succeeding tenant, and payment of compensation for them might be a very large charge on a small owner. Why should a great principle be departed from, and the small owner be subjected to what might be a very great risk for a thing his tenant did not particularly want? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture had conducted the Bill with such moderation that he felt very loth to ask his noble friend to divide, but he hoped he would divide, as the point was a most important one. When he looked at the schedules it occurred to him that this proposal had been inserted into Part II., because it looked so very meagre when it only contained the item "drainage," but he would remind his right hon. friend if he thought the second part too thin, that a bit of good thin ham was preferable to a bit of thick bad bacon in a sandwich. He hoped that the question at issue would not be made, on division, a Government question.

MR. WALLACE (Perth) thought the hon. Member who had just spoken must have forgotten the very terms of the Bill which he had criticised. He took as an illustration a tenant who planted an osier bed which would be of no use to the succeeding tenant, and yet the landlord would have to pay compensation for the bed, on the determination of the tenancy. Now, the express words of the compensation section were that where a tenant had made an improvement on his holding he was to be entitled—

> "At the determination of the tenancy, on quitting his holding, to obtain from the landlord as compensation under the said Acts for the improvement, such sum as fairly represents the value of the improvement to an incoming tenant."

Therefore, if the improvement was of no value to the incoming tenant there was no compensation. His object in rising was to make a most earnest appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to stand by this clause as it was. After all, this schedule was something of a compromise, for Amendments had been moved from both sides suggesting to leave out and to add to. He intended to support the Government, not because the Bill was all that he wished it to be, but because it was the best possible that they could get. If the right hon. Gentleman stood by this schedule he would very soon get the Bill through.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Hertfordshire, St. Albans) said one of the objections he had to the Bill was that it would embark the landlord in investments of a speculative character. It was bad to allow a man to obtain a temporary hold on property on one representation, and then to deal with it afterwards differently from that representation. Take an illustration. A private house was let to a man who spent a great deal of money in converting it into a theatre, from which he made a large profit. At the determination of the lease was the landlord to pay compensation, although the theatre was of no value to the new tenant? That was exactly the case with either fruit trees or osiers, the market for which was limited. His hon. friend the Member for North Hants spoke as if it were an immense advantage that notice had to be given to the landlord; but he could see none. A man was asked to spend money on the principle of "heads I win, tails you lose." For instance, a man incurred heavy expenditure on fruit trees, and before they became mature he came upon the landlord for compensation for those trees, which might be perfectly healthy and strong, but which were of no good, because the local market had either ceased to exist or was dying; and on the landlord would fall the loss of that speculation. He could not approve of the line taken by the right hon. the President of the Board of Agriculture. He understood him to say that he was not afraid of the extension of the principle of the measure. Personally, he was afraid of it; but whether right or wrong, he objected to a principle which could not be logically extended in practice. The right hon. Gentleman had given no explanation of how the extension of the principle could be logically opposed, and it might be that in the fulness of time, when the right hon. Gentleman crossed the floor of the House he would be found saying that what was perfectly right now would be perfectly wrong then. He opposed the whole thing ab initio. A man to whom property was handed over by a landlord temporarily and for a specific purpose had no right to use that property for another purpose without the landlord's consent. If it were in the public interest that orchards and osieries should be made without the consent of the landlord, there should be no limitation to an acre. The man should be entitled to turn the whole holding into a fruit garden or osiery. It was ludicrous to make a limitation. The truth was that the right hon. Gentleman, in his general desire to meet certain views, had fallen into an error of principle, capable of immense extension. While the thing was yet small it could be stopped, and he begged the right hon. Gentleman to listen to those on his own side of the House and withdraw a proposal containing what was a most mischievous principle.

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth) said he represented a large agricultural constituency twelve hundred square miles in extent. Many of the tenant farmers in Lincolnshire had asked for the assistance of the Legislature to protect them from the unreasonable and unrestricted conditions imposed on them by the landlords who refused to give full freedom to tenants in carrying on their business. It was contended in the course of this debate that the land was the property of the landlords to do what they like with. But he ventured to suggest that there was a co-partnership in the products of the property between the landlord and the tenant. The farmer provided the intelligence, the capital, and the labour, and the landlord supplied the land. He trusted the Government were going to maintain this clause, which would certainly give to the tenant, though on a small scale, a latitude he ought to have, and which had not hitherto been his. In one part of Lincolnshire stiff clay land had been largely used for growing roots, but it was ultimately used with great profit to both landlord and tenant for trenching and growing celery. For many years, however, the same arguments used to-day had been employed to prevent the tenants cultivating celery instead of roots; but the landlords had at last come to see that it was for their mutual interest to give the tenants liberty in that particular direction. What was true of celery was true of osiers, fruit gardens, and orchards. Surely a tenant, who was a man of intelligence, and who had to watch the outgoing of every penny, would not spend money in the conversion of an acre of his farm into an osier bed or a fruit garden without an intelligent forecast of a return for the outlay of his money. If the garden or osier beds were of no value to the incoming tenant there would be nothing for the landlord to pay. The clause was a very moderate concession to farmers, who ought to be encouraged rather than obstructed in making experiments on small portions of their holdings; and he hoped the Government would adhere to it.

MR. HARDY (Kent, Ashford) hoped the right hon. Gentleman might yet see his way to accept his Amendment in regard to osier beds, which stood on a different ground entirely from orchards or fruit gardens. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman one question as concerning the words proposed to be left out. In the Grand Committee considerable doubt was expressed as to whether it might not be possible as the section now stood to make several small osier beds on a farm which in the aggregate would cover a considerable number of acres. It was very likely that a farmer might take several small plots separate from each other on the banks of a stream, and that these collectively would be far greater than the limitation proposed in the schedule. In Grand Committee the right hon. Gentleman undertook to introduce qualifying words if he were advised that there was any doubt on the subject. He would like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied that the words "not exceeding one acre" would obviate the difficulty which had been raised.

*MR. LONG: I did carefully consider that point, and I have been assured that the clause as worded would limit the farmer to planting one acre in all.

SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College) said the Government might well agree to accept this Amendment without any fear of losing the Bill as a whole. The Government might rest assured that very little interest was taken in this question, which was a very small one in itself, but, as a matter of principle, of very great importance. If this schedule was passed, although it would not do much in the direction desired for the benefit of the tenant, it would be used in the future to deprive the landlord of the right to decide as to what use his land should be put. The result might be that the landlord would have to pay compensation for what had actually made the holding of less value than before.

MR. JOHNSON-FERGUSON (Leicestershire, Loughborough) said if the Amendment were accepted it would strike at the real principle of the Bill, as laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, and a tenant would not be able to plant an osier bed without first obtaining the permission of the landlord. If an improvement was to change the character of the farm, he could very well understand that it should be necessary to obtain first the consent of the landlord; but if the improvement was a mere adjunct to the amenity of the holding, then that consent should not be necessary. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would adhere to the clause as it stood.

LORD HUGH CECIL said he had listened with great interest to the debate, and he could not congratulate his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture on having received very much support from his own side of the House. The only speech in his favour came from the hon. Member for North Hampshire, who relied mainly on his great faith in fruit farming for the benefit of the country. One of the ablest speeches made upon the Amendment was founded on a ground all those who supported the Bill regarded as most dangerous. One hon. Member regarded it as a compromise because it was supported from both sides of the House; another, with a perfectly open mind, argued on one side and formed his conclusions on the other. The right hon. Gentleman having, to judge by his speech, an eccentric love for doing what is practically useless and logically pernicious, proposed to adhere to the Bill as it stood. There were hon. Members who had not an unreasoning zeal in favour of want of logic; they preferred what was logically sound and sensible, and therefore they intended to divide the House.

MR. PHILIPPS (Pembrokeshire) said the noble Lord who had just sat down appeared to think the landlord would be robbed because a tenant was going to be given a discretion with regard to the way he might cultivate one acre of his farm. No one could read the papers for a week without finding articles deploring the amount of eggs or other produce we were importing, and moralising on the want of energy of our agriculturalists, who allowed this importation of articles which they might produce themselves. What the Government proposed to do was to say that with regard to one acre of his holding the farmer shall be allowed a discretion, so that he might be able to move with the times if he had the capacity to do so. A variety of arguments had been urged against the clause. The hon. Member for Woodbridge did not like it for the reason that though it would not much affect the large landowner, it might bear very hardly on the small landlords, who were poor men, if they had to give compensation for these improvements. People were always lamenting that more money was not put into the land, yet hon. Members like the hon. Member for Woodbridge objected to the tenants putting their money into it.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN: Not at all. I only objected to their spending the landlords' money.

MR. PHILIPPS said that in this case the tenant spent his own money in improving the land, and if objection was now to be raised to his spending his own money as regarded improving an acre of land, how was capital to get into the land and farming to progress at all? The right hon. Member for Thanet said that fruit farming up to an acre ought not to be allowed, because a farmer in the North of England might plant an acre—which was not adapted to the purpose—with fruit trees. But as regarded one acre, which was a moderate enough proposal, it was absurd to say that a farmer should not plant fruit trees because some stupid person might plant them on unsuitable land. Two principles had been discussed on this Amendment. One principle was that somebody unconnected with agriculture and who did not understand it should teach the farmer his business; the other principle was to leave the farmer a free hand in order that he might try and do something to promote progress in his business. The Government had not gone very far in that direction, but their proposal was a right one and he should support it.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk) pointed out that the Amendment before the Committee was not so much directed against those who wished to make an orchard or a garden as it was to the question of whether, if a man did so on another man's land without the owner's consent or against his will, the owner should pay him compensation when he gave up his tenancy. He rose for the purpose of suggesting a compromise. The Amendment appeared to apply more particularly to osier beds than to orchards and gardens, and it was argued that the change in the character of the holding was much more serious in that case. He thought, therefore, an agreement might be arrived at by giving way on the question of osier beds, and allowing the clause to stand as at present with regard to orchards and gardens.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) said that, whatever might have been the case, the proposals of the Bill had been given away by the hon. Member for Louth, who appeared to look upon the relation of the landlord and tenant as that of a partnership, and he desired that one partner should have power to break the articles of partnership and make experiments in his own interests. But a partnership was generally governed by articles, one of which forbade one partner engaging in speculations or experiments. Yet that was the relationship which it was suggested to apply between the landlord and the tenant. But, apart from that, he thought that these proposals required more consideration than had been bestowed upon them. They appeared to have been pitchforked into the Bill without any consideration as to how they would work out in practice. There was no proportion about them; however small or however large the holding, the acre multiplied by three might be taken off. So that on a holding of seven acres, nearly half might be taken for experiments, and when another tenant took the holding he might take another three and leave only one acre. Those were matters which should be guarded against, and which ought to have been foreseen, and in his opinion it would be better to withdraw the present proposal, and bring it forward in some other form which would deal with those objections. Arguments were often urged that when there was no permanent value in the improvements to the holding, the tenant would not be paid for them. He distrusted such arguments, because if the arbitrator had power to give compensation he would always look with a kindly eye upon the man who had laid out his money. The man might have laid it out unwisely, and in a manner which would bring no permanent return, but so long as human nature remained as it was, the arbitrator would see some possibilities of good to the incoming tenant. What the House had to consider was whether the proposals were good in themselves, and whether sufficient provision had been made to guard against those difficulties and possible differences which he had drawn to the attention of the House.

COMMANDER BETHELL thought it would be only just and fair after what had been said on both sides of the House if the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill would allow the division to be taken without the Government tellers, and not attempt to coerce the party, but leave it free and let them by their votes give the true sense of the House upon the Amendment.

*EARL PERCY said he would formally move the next Amendment, though, after the overwhelming support given to the Government by the Opposition in the lobby, he would not take a division for the purpose of asking a question which perhaps the Attorney General would answer. Under the Bill a tenant would be allowed to make a garden to the extent of an acre without the consent of the landlord; but in the case of a yearly tenancy and the tenant going out at the end of the year, would the new tenant be free to add another acre to the tenancy?

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 10, to leave out the words 'exceeding one acre.'"—(Earl Percy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the amount of compensation would arise out of the whole tenancy, and the limit in the schedule would apply to the one tenancy.

*EARL PERCY: But the next yearly tenant, and the next, and the next again?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said he should certainly read the Bill as applying to one tenancy, and the next tenant would have equal right with his predecessor.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said the Attorney General told them distinctly that if a new tenant came in or a son took up his father's tenancy, he might set to work on other three acres. In the previous discussion he was opposed by his hon. friend the Member for North Hampshire, who was the only Conservative Member who supported the Government by speech. His hon. friend said that if a tenant experimented by planting osiers he would get no compensation from the valuer. He ventured to differ entirely from that. He was sorry to say that he had tried the experiment of planting osiers, and he had been fool enough to plant an orchard. He could assure the House that he had deeply regretted both experiments. An hon. and learned friend of his was, he knew, a great authority on gardening, and he had been so good as to afford some valuable information in a publication which he could only hope his tenants had never read. According to the hon. Member for Hereford, the way to make money was to plant orchards and embark in fruit cultivation. That might be true in his case and his neighbourhood, but in his own it was disastrous.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I understood that all these three Amendments about osiers, gardens, and orchards were to be discussed in the first, but if there are to be separate debates on each of these Amendments the right hon. Gentleman cannot go into the question of orchards now.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER said that in the previous debate he did not touch on the question of orchards, while his hon. friend, in moving this Amendment, never alluded to osiers at all. Of course he drew a great distinction between osiers and other experiments of that kind. He was endeavouring to show that gardening, as distinguished from osier beds and fruit trees, was a very doubtful speculation indeed. Certainly in his own neighbourhood, if any farmer were to suggest to him—he never had a tenant who would do it—that he wanted to devote his attention to gardening, he would advise him, if he wished to retain any portion of his capital, to keep out of the gardening business. It now appeared that the entire character of a holding might be speculatively altered without the consent of the landlord, and he hoped that in another place common sense would amend the Bill in this respect.

LORD HUGH CECIL said it was necessary to comment upon what the Attorney General had told them. It would be remembered that the President of the Board of Agriculture relied very largely on the fact that one acre was the limit. The explanation of the Attorney General disposed of the statement that this improvement or injury would be limited to one acre. They now learned as a matter of fact that if one tenancy succeeded another, acre after acre would be liable to be so treated. The question was left in a substantially different position from that in which they approached it when the discussion commenced. He believed it to be a pernicious principle to extend to one acre, but they now knew that it might be extended to a great many acres. A more ridiculous conclusion and a greater piece of absurdity it would be impossible to imagine. He hoped the Government would amend this in the other House.

COMMANDER BETHELL said he had the impression that his right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture had no suspicion of what was buried in the close of this Bill, and he saw the look of surprise that came over his face when the Attorney General made this painful discovery of the extent to which these proceedings might be carried in the course of a few years. He suggested that something should be done to meet this difficulty when the Bill went to a place where common sense could be applied to it.

*MR. LONG: Nobody can have any doubt whatever of the conditions under which compensation will be payable to a tenant. I am bound to say that it did not occur to me that the objection now raised was a very important one, because I think it is not likely to occur frequently.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: My Amendment refers to item twelve of Part I. of the schedule, which requires the consent of the landlord for the reclaiming of waste land. The effect of that will be practically in the north of Scotland to veto all the reclamation of land which is now going on day by day. We ought rather to encourage the labour by which people make one or more blades of grass grow where none grew before. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture does not claim to have special knowledge of the north of Scotland, but I am glad to say that the Attorney General has that knowledge, and I would appeal to him in regard to the correctness of my statement and the reasonableness of the small concession I now ask for. I think as the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has refused to give us a separate Scotch Bill, he will feel himself bound, as far as he possibly can, to meet any particular grievance pointed out to him as arising from the different circumstances of Scotland, and especially the north of Scotland, to those of England. My proposition is that if the improvements which take the form of reclaiming the waste land require the consent of the landlord practically the improvements cannot go on. As the right hon. Gentleman does not claim special knowledge of the north of Scotland, I will very briefly explain what the circumstances are. Very frequently an arrangement has been made with a large proprietor holding a great amount of waste land, as well as fertile and cultivable land. The proprietor often settles industrious cultivators on the land. I would instance the case of the Duke of Fife, who holds a large estate in Banffshire. His predecessor settled a great number of people on these terms. He said to them, "You must not look to me for money to assist you in your improvements or your reclamation, but I will put moderate rents upon the ground, which is now very unproductive, and you will get the whole benefit that arises from building your houses, reclaiming the land, draining it, and the like."

That was the understanding under which these industrious small holders have reclaimed very large tracts of country and very much improved all that district. But it is quite evident that these are small operations. How is it that one of those small holders proceeds to reclaim? It is perhaps by digging an open trench, by removing boulders, by digging up heather, and by putting down a spadeful or two of lime when he has the opportunity. He does not undertake great reclamations, but he is at it from day to day, constantly at work, and the ultimate result is that a very valuable new tract of cultivated land is brought within the proprietor's domain. If he had to get the consent of the landlord for each of these operations it would be impossible. Distances are great, and he cannot go away miles and miles to the proprietor or his agent to get his sanction for these small improvements. What I would really be glad to see would be that the reclamation of waste land should be taken out of the hands of the landlord altogether and handed over to the tenant. I cannot see how the landlord's interest can in any way be affected by a change from heather into grass. Therefore, in imposing this restriction, you are really putting a difficulty in the way of carrying out improvements by an industrious and enterprising people. In fact I think I may say that a great part of the land now under cultivation would never have been brought under cultivation if a difficulty of this sort had existed. Therefore I should be glad to see this restriction removed altogether, but I know there is no use in pressing opposition on the matter and asking very much. I have only suggested that land for reclamation, not exceeding an acre, should be left to the discretion of the tenant. I have referred to the Duke of Fife's estate rules. As long as the Duke of Fife owns that land the tenant is perfectly safe in making the reclamation, but then, unfortunately, it sometimes happens, as has happened in the case of the Duke of Fife, that the landlord sells a considerable portion of the land, and then the estate rules cease to operate, and people who have been working on the faith of those rules, find that there is no protection for their improvements at all. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, line 19, after the words 'waste land,' to insert the words, 'exceeding one acre.'"—(Sir William Wedderburn.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG: It is obviously impossible to discuss the Amendment under consideration without reference to the one that follows it, and is consequent upon it. I have considerable sympathy with the hon. baronet in his desire that some concession should be made to tenants who find themselves in the circumstances described, but I do not think the change he suggests is one that is desirable. He has no doubt in his mind a particular class of tenants effecting a particular kind of reclamation, but the term "reclamation of waste land" is one which is applied in various ways in different parts of the country, and while it might be quite fair to enable this work to be done without limitation in some parts of the country, under his conditions it would be unfair and unwise to permit it elsewhere. While the reclamation of waste land is of the utmost importance as affecting the future value of the land it may be land which some people consider it is altogether undesirable to improve and reclaim. There are many kinds of waste land. There is waste land over which not only the owner but particular persons have certain rights, and it is conceivable that in such cases difficulties might arise if tenants were empowered to reclaim the land without the consent of the landlord or his agent. Under these circumstances I will ask the House to resist the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I venture to express the hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be open to persuasion on this point. I think it has sometimes accelerated the progress of a measure if the Minister in charge of it gives way gracefully occasionally. I cannot help thinking that he has somewhat exaggerated the importance of the Amendment moved by my hon. friend. I do not for one moment dispute that there may be very good reasons for inserting the item in the first schedule applying to the reclamation of waste land generally, because it is quite obvious that there may be cases where money would be thrown away in reclaiming land which would never be of profit to the owner. If the reclamation of land is carried to a large extent, I think the consent of the landlord ought first to be obtained. The Amendment moved by my hon. friend is strictly limited to the reclamation of waste land to the extent of an acre. I do not want to exaggerate the importance of the Amendment—I do not know that it is of so much importance as to justify the right hon. Gentleman in refusing to consider it; and certainly in those cases to which my hon. friend more particularly referred—small holdings in the Highlands—I do believe it might have some beneficial effect. I cannot conceive a case in which a landlord would refuse his consent to the reclamation of an acre of land where it was manifest that the reclamation would improve the value of the land. Considering how very little the right hon. Gentleman has been asked to give way, he would do a good thing if he would be persuaded to change his mind.

MR. VICARY GIBBS: I have very considerable sympathy with the hon. Baronet's object. Every argument the right hon. Gentleman used against the Amendment might be used against himself in other matters. I said some time ago that the Bill was faulty in principle, and before five months have passed we have an illustration of that fact. There is no reason whatever why, if it is right to give compensation for an orchard cultivated without the landlord's consent, it should not be right to give it for the reclamation of an acre of bog land. I can see no distinction between them. Both are good objects. The question is whether that should be done at somebody else's expense. I merely wish to point out how very quickly the effect which I ventured to prophesy has been fulfilled.

Another Amendment made.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devonshire, Ashburton) said the Amendment which he had to propose was a very simple one, which he thought the right hon. Gentleman would be able to accept. Its object was to place the tenant farmer in precisely the same position as the Bill placed the market gardener. At the end of Part III. of Schedule I. there appeard the words—

"(v.) Erection or enlargement of buildings for the purpose of the trade or business of a market gardener."

If the market gardener was entitled to that provision a fortiori the farmer ought to have a similar proviso. His proposal was to insert the words at the end of line 24, "erection or enlargement of buildings for the purpose of the trade or business of a farmer." To keep a large number of cattle it was necessary that shelter should be provided for them, and the farmer, to his mind, should be protected in his expenditure upon such things as shelter for his cattle, sheds for machinery, pigsties, houses for poultry, and such-like erections. It so happened that landlords were very often impecunious, and unable to provide these buildings. Under such circumstances it was only fair that the farmer should have the opportunity of putting up such accommodation for himself, and obtaining compensation. He need hardly say that he did not sympathise with those hon. Gentlemen on the opposite benches who looked askance at everything which would directly benefit the tenant, and which in their view was an infringement upon the landlords' rights of property. He had the misfortune of being a landlord himself, and he could only say that he was perfectly convinced that the greater security they gave to the tenant's property the greater would be the value of the tenancy, and the higher would be the rent which the tenant would be willing to pay for his holding.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 6, after line 26, to insert the words, '(16) erection or enlargement of buildings for the purpose of the trade or business of a farmer.'"—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG said the object was to confine Part I. to the "erection, alteration, or enlargement of buildings." He could not accept the Amendment, because the intention was to limit the power to the erection and enlargement of buildings where the consent of the landlord was required. The right hon. Gentleman had based his Amendment very largely upon the assumption that in the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act that power existed. He was not prepared at present to express any opinion upon that point, but he held very strongly that it was most desirable that in these cases the work should be done by the landlord. Buildings erected for the purposes of agriculture ought to be so erected as to be of a permanent and enduring character. He fancied that at the present moment there was really less justification for the Amendment than probably there ever was before. Therefore he was not prepared to accept the introduction of an Amendment which was entirely contrary to the intention of the powers of the Bill. It might be that they had not quite succeeded in exactly carrying out their intentions, which was to limit their power to the erection of large buildings which required that the consent of the landlord should be given.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

A formal Amendment agreed to.

*MR. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrewshire, E.): I put this Amendment on the Paper in order to meet the views of persons interested in agriculture in Scotland who think that the definition of temporary pasture laid down in the Bill is rather wide. As it is at present interpreted, it would be quite possible to lay down temporary pasture and to take off a hay crop and then to claim compensation for the remaining pasture, the value of which might have been taken out in the hay crop, or by artificial manure of an exhausting character having been used on the land. I do not ask the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment as it is, but I would be very glad if he would consider a closer definition of temporary pasture before this Bill passes through the other House. I think he will see on consideration that the definition is of such wide character that it might open the door to unnecessary legislation, which I am sure we are all anxious to avoid, and that it would lead to disappointment on the part of tenants making claims for laying down pasture for three years, according to what we call in Scotland the rules of good husbandry, for the purpose of resting the land. When pasture is laid down for resting the land it is not of very much value. I should be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman would see whether a better definition could not be found to meet the case of Scotland, and especially to meet the case of pasture laid down to rest the land.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 7, line 12, to leave out paragraph 28 of Schedule 1, and insert the words, 'Laying down pasture with clover, grass, lucerne, sainfoin, or other similar seeds, which shall not have been sown more than three years previous to the termination of the lease, from which no hay crop shall have been taken, and which shall not have been treated with exhausting artificial manures.'"—(Mr. Shaw-Stewart.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. LONG: The Government are entirely at one with my hon. friend in his desire that there should be no confusion as to the definitions of temporary and permanent pasture. I confess I do not altogether share the fears of my hon. friend that there would be any difficulty on the part of an arbitrator as to what constitutes temporary pasture and what constitutes permanent pasture. On the other hand it is possible that in Scotland and in some parts of England where permanent pasture is almost unknown there may be some doubt in the mind of an arbitrator, but my hon. friend will, I am sure, see that the words he suggests would not meet such a case. With reference to taking a hay crop off, I think it would be a hardship if in a dry summer a farmer found himself forbidden from taking hay from his sainfoin under the penalty of being deprived of getting compensation for an agricultural operation which would otherwise entitle him to it. If there is any doubt whatever in the definition as to what is permanent and what is temporary pasture I will take care on behalf of the Government to see that in another place the words are, if necessary, made clear.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I should like to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to another matter, and that is the limit of three years. It is within my own knowledge that temporary pasture is frequently allowed to run on for more than three years, at all events in the part of the country with which I am best acquainted. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter very carefully before he adopts the apparently narrow limit of three years. I speak with personal knowledge of the subject, because it has been, within my own personal experience, a matter of discussion among agriculturists.

*MR. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon): In my own constituency there is a little fear that some hardship may arise out of this question of temporary and permanent pasture. A certain amount of pasture for which no consent has been obtained may be laid down, and under this Act no claim for compensation for it can arise, and the remedy of the tenant if the landlord refuses to take it off his hands at a valuation at the termination of the tenancy is to take a white crop off before the tenancy is concluded. There is a feeling among farmers in the country—derived, no doubt, from reading text-books and other works on the law of agriculture—that permanent pasture depends on the time the pasture has been laid down. I have often seen these statements myself, and I know how likely they are to create that impression, not without reason, on the minds of farmers. A farmer is afraid, having laid down pasture without obtaining the previous consent of the landlord, that it may have remained down too long to be lawfully ploughed up again, and that he will lose all claim to compensation by not having obtained consent and also lose the right to plough it up because it has become permanent pasture within the meaning of his covenant not to plough up permanent pasture by lapse of time. If my right hon. friend will consider the matter, I think he will see that it is a question well worthy of his consideration.

*MR. LONG: I do not think that the difficulties to which my hon. friend refers are likely to arise. I will examine into the matter, and if I find there is any necessity to make such a provision, I will take care that words are introduced to carry out the object the House has in view—namely, that there should be no confusion whatever as between temporary and permanent pasture.

*MR. SHAW-STEWART: I have every reason to be perfectly satisfied with the undertaking of my right hon. friend, and I will ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE said the Amendment he desired to move was one which followed the existing state of the law as far as possible. He should like, in the first place, to clear the air by saying that the Amendment did not ask that the arbitrator should give his reasons. He did not suggest that, and he did not wish it. He was thoroughly in agreement with the good old maxim that the wisest judge or the most competent arbitrator gave no reasons whatever for his decision, and therefore he wished to state that it was not his desire, in moving the Amendment, that the arbitrator should be compelled to give his reasons. It had also been suggested that the effect of the Amendment would be to facilitate appeals. He did not desire to facilitate appeals, and he thought it was very desirable that the procedure under the Act should be so simple and precise as to discourage rather than encourage appeals. There would be an appeal as the Bill stood on questions of law, and the effect of the Amendment, if accepted, would not be to facilitate or increase the number of appeals. There could be no appeal on questions of amount which had been once referred to an arbitrator, and that would be the principal part of the work under the Act. There might possibly be an appeal on a question of fact—as, for instance, if an arbitrator awarded a sum in respect of a matter which was not in the original claim; but that would be a case quite apart from the Amendment. His object in moving the Amendment was that the incoming tenant or the landlord might know exactly what it was he was paying compensation for. Was it unreasonable or unnatural that the landlord or the tenant should like to know what he was paying for under the several items which might make up a very considerable award? It had been stated that in commercial cases referred to an arbitrator the award was given in the shape of a lump sum, and no details were given. He did not think that that was an analogous case at all, because in such cases the arbitration took place after the parties had come into a court of law. At all the events, the courts were open to them, and any person resorting to the courts as plaintiff was subject to the liability of having to give particulars of his claim. As regards the cases which would be dealt with by the Amendment, the parties were not able to enter the ordinary courts of law, but would have to go straight to arbitration. Therefore these cases were widely different from commercial cases, in which arbitration was voluntary. As the Bill stood not only might the tenant make a claim, but the landlord might make a counter claim, and yet there was nothing to compel or induce the arbitrator even to show two lump sums, one to be awarded to the landlord and the other to the tenant. It would be perfectly possible in such a case for the arbitrator to strike a balance and award a lump sum, without giving the slightest indication to either of the parties as to how it was arrived at. He would ask the House to consider a further argument. The tenant was to be put into a position to claim compensation for improvements mentioned in the first schedule of the Bill. The schedule itself was divided into three parts, which were sub-divided into thirty-four different items. There were fifteen items in Part I., for any of which a tenant might make a claim for compensation. It was not reasonable to suppose a tenant would make a claim under every one of these heads, but he might very well make a claim for the enlargement or alteration of buildings, for the laying down of permanent pasture, for road making, and for embanking. Such ordinary improvements might very well be included in a claim for compensation, and was it unreasonable to ask the arbitrator to state in making his award how much he gave in respect of the enlargement or alteration of buildings, how much for permanent pasture, how much for road making, and how much for embanking? He thought it only fair and reasonable that the incoming tenant or the landlord should know what he had to pay under each item. Again, in Part II., in addition to the matters to which the attention of the House had been already directed, there could be five further claims. Drainage was a very important and expensive matter, and the man who wanted to keep his estate books properly might very reasonably ask the arbitrator to state what part of an award represented drainage. There were fourteen different heads of improvements under Part III. which were in a somewhat different position, because neither consent nor notice was required. They might be carried out by the tenant on his own motion without the knowledge of the landlord, and the claim for them at the expiration of the tenancy might be the first time they were brought to the landlord's attention. Such improvements included artificial manures, laying down permanent pasture, food stuffs, and fertilisers, and was it unreasonable to ask what amount had been awarded in respect of these different items? If the award was made in a lump sum it must be made up of items. He did not ask for the number of years purchase, but the arbitrator must have the items from which the grand total of the award was made up, and he asked that that should be specified. That laid no particular burden upon the arbitrator. He asked for nothing which the arbitrator had not before his mind to make the award satisfactory to himself, having regard to the interests of the person who had to pay and the person who had to receive. He must know what he had given compensation for, and how much he gave in respect of each item. It was in the interest of the arbitrator also, because nothing would clear his mind more than the fact that his award had to be made up of certain items, and that he must have the details and the amount of each particular item making it up. Nothing helped a man more in a case of that sort than to know that he had to deal with definite figures which he must obtain for himself. It would, moreover, give confidence to the awards of the arbitrator, because each party would be able to go through the awards and test them, and it was greatly to the interest of all concerned that the awards should be looked at in that way, and nothing would be more likely than such a thing to popularise the Act in the country. He desired also to call attention to the fact that the law used to be far more drastic than he now asked that it should be made. For the last twenty years the law had been that the award should not give a sum generally for compensation, but should, as far as possible, specify the items upon which compensation was awarded. That was much more drastic than his proposal, and he had never heard any complaint made with regard to the working of that law. He therefore felt that he might fairly ask the House to accept the Amendment he proposed.

"In page 8, to insert, as a new paragraph, before paragraph (10)—

"'(10) The award shall, so far as possible, specify the several improvements, acts, or things in respect of which compensation is awarded, and the sum awarded in respect of each.'"—(Mr. Heywood Johnstone.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. LONG said the object the Government had in introducing the Bill was to further the recommendations of the Royal Commission; one of the recommendations was that the award of the arbitrator should be final, but the Government thought it right to vary that recommendation by giving a right of appeal in regard to matters of law; but they also sought to avoid the expense and difficulty attendant on a detailed form of award, and the expense and delay attendant on litigation which invariably arose on an appeal from an award to a court of law. In earlier proposals made by the hon. Gentleman to amend the Government proposal there appeared to be a risk of litigation, and an Amendment which might give rise to litigation was one the Government must always strenuously oppose, because one of the advantages of the Bill was to make the award of the arbitrator final. The hon. Gentleman had put the case fairly to the House, and it would now be necessary to detail the reasons why the Government were not prepared to accept the Amendment. There were a number of suggestions dealing with the same subject but not in exactly the same way, and the course the Government proposed to take was to accept the Amendment standing next in the name of the noble Lord the Member for Kensington, the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Hampshire, which proposed to limit the time in which payment was to be made, and also that of the hon. Member for Shropshire, which imposed upon the Board of Agriculture the obligation of providing a compulsory form to be used by the arbitrators in making their award. He accepted the general desires which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Horsham, that there should be such a statement by the arbitrator as would enable the parties, if they so desired, to know what the grounds were upon which the award was given. He did not think the duty should be made obligatory on the arbitrator unless the parties desired it, nor did he at the moment think it desirable to suggest the form that the declaration should take, but it would endeavour to secure that the arbitrators should have a simple way of giving their awards, and at the same time there should be no risk of their being upset upon a technical ground. He hoped that would meet the views of the hon. Member for Horsham, and perhaps he would now withdraw his Amendment, so that a single proposal might be brought before the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 8, line 21, at the beginning of paragraph (10), to insert the words, 'The arbitrator shall on the application of either party specify the amount awarded in respect of any particular improvement, and."—(Earl Percy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PERKS asked whether the application had to be made during the course of the arbitration or after the award had been made.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE said he did not know w ether the right hon. Gentleman would accept an Amendment to add after the word "improvement" the words, "or improvements." It would not alter the substance of the clause, but would have a very considerable effect upon the effectiveness of it.

MR. HEDDERWICK desired to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the wisdom and discretion he had shown in accepting the Amendment. The object of the right hon. Gentleman was to facilitate proceedings as much as possible, to avoid litigation, and to make the whole course of the Act, when the Bill became an Act, as inexpensive as possible. There was a great deal of force in the argument urged upon the Amendment just withdrawn, because, if the arbitrator was not to specify, or did not specify upon application, the items upon which his award was made, it was quite clear that the parties might be induced, where the sum of the award was large, to embark in expensive litigation in the hope that part of that sum had been awarded wrongly by the arbitrator under the first schedule. Had the award been final, as was proposed by the Royal Commission, there would have been an end of the matter, but the right to appeal had been reserved on a point of law, and there were no fewer than three points of law in the first schedule which might be raised by either party in the hope of discovering a mistake in the award. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had shown a wise discretion in accepting the Amendment of the noble Lord.

*MR. LONG said it was clear that the arbitrator could not listen to an application for details until after the award was made. The award could not be delivered until the amount was fixed. With regard to the next Amendment of the hon. Member for Horsham, he did not think it would have any effect.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN pointed out that the arbitrators before whom these cases would come would be men unaccustomed to legal documents, and that they might be upset upon purely technical points.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford) said the words suggested by the hon. Member for Horsham made the matter a little more clear than at present, and he hoped the Amendment would be accepted. With regard to the application to be made to the arbitrator, the correct thing would be to make the application when the arbitration took place. It was extremely undesirable that a hard-and-fast rule should be made, and after the award had been taken up the parties ought to be allowed to refer back to the arbitrator, in order that he should specify how the award was arrived at.

COMMANDER BETHELL joined in appealing to the right hon. Gentleman to agree to the addition, after the word "improvement" of the words "or improvements."

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the Interpretation Act of 1889 provided words which covered this clause, but as the additional words did no harm the Government were prepared to accept them.

Amendment amended, by inserting after the word "improvement," the words "or improvements."

Words, as amended, inserted.

Other Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I rise not for the purpose of obstructing the Third Reading of this Bill, but for the purpose of informing the House that the Housing Committee of the London County Council or some of its members waited on the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in the form of a deputation, and the result of the interview was that the right hon. Gentleman could not see his way to adopt any of their recommendations as to the extension of the time for the repayment of loans to one hundred years. He said he thought that there was something to be said in favour of the suggestion that the land should be made an asset off the building, but I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to adopt it. It is quite true that he adopted one suggestion in that regard, but that will not materially alter the present condition; it is a mere manipulation of figures—taking a penny out of one pocket and putting it into another. I quite admit that what was in the Bill as it was originally introduced was good, but the right hon. Gentleman assumes, because he is going to enable municipalities to purchase land outside their own boundaries, that that is going to solve the housing problem. He might just as well say, "We enable you by this Bill to purchase all the land in England if you desire so to do, and you can have workmen's trains, cheap trams, light railways, etc., to carry the workman from his employment to his home." I speak upon this question not from a theoretical but from a practical point of view and the workman's point of view, having lived the whole of my life among the workmen, and knowing the social conditions under which they live. And I want to know what is the right hon. Gentleman going to do with the half a million workmen living in the County of London to-day, whose average wages do not exceed 15s. a week. Is it possible—build as many houses as you like outside the County of London—for those men to remove their goods and chattels, and pay fares to and from their employment, when they are fortunate enough to have any, out of such a scanty wage? There is another point with reference to working men residing outside the county—men occupying the same position as myself when I was at work. I was a riverside worker, and I had to be at my employment at six o'clock in the morning. Does the right hon. Gentleman assume, even if I could get a house outside the county that I could get into, that I should live in a place which would entail upon me the hardship of having to get up at four o'clock in the morning in order to get to my employment at six? There are thousands of people in that position, and therefore, though the county council buy as much land as they please outside the county and build as much as they like, there will always be the same demand as now for houses inside the county. Go east to Walthamstow, Upton Park, and other places, and you will find that private enterprise has built hundreds of houses outside the county, and the working man who has not to get to his employment until eight or nine o'clock in the morning has been for years availing himself of the advantages offered by that private enterprise, and has moved into the suburbs. In twelve years in Stepney, where I reside, half the population have removed to the suburbs, and in consequence of the demand for accommodation the landlords there have increased their rents. While I am prepared to accept the advantage that we, as a municipality, shall have under this Bill, I say it will never solve the housing problem. I am sorry to say that in my opinion the Bill will pass its Third Reading in a far worse form than when it was originally introduced, because the right hon. Gentleman has accepted an Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Chelsea which is going to enable municipalities to buy land and lease it, if they think fit, to the jerry builder, and any other speculator who comes along. That is the most dangerous principle that could be inserted in the Bill. I am not a supporter of Her Majesty's Government, I have been a Radical all my life; but, at the same time, I may say there is a right hon. Gentleman in this House who, during the short period I have been a Member, I have learned most highly to respect. I allude to the First Lord of the Treasury. Hon. Gentlemen laugh, and my respect may not be worth much to him, but he is above all things a gentleman, and a workman can appreciate a gentleman when he meets with one; at the same time I notice that the right hon. Gentleman has a charming manner of avoiding arguments put forward on this side of the House. I well recollect on the Second Reading of the London Government Bill of last year how in winding up the debate he taunted Members on this side of the House for putting forward as he considered no remedy, and we have had a repetition of that attitude on the Second Reading of this Housing Bill. Again he taunts us with criticising a measure and putting forward no remedies, and waives away as with a magician's wand all arguments adduced from this side of the House upon this subject. He takes credit to himself and to the Government for the fact that all these Bills which have been introduced and have become law have been passed by Conservative Governments I do not deny it. [Cheers.] Yes, but stop a moment; I do not know whether hon. Gentlemen who cheer that remark have ever visited a fair; if they have, they have seen shows where the audience is admitted for a penny or twopence, and on the platform outside which the showman exposes the whole of his wares. The man outside is induced to go in, and thinks he is going to see a good show, but finds after all that the show for which he has paid is not so good as that which he saw outside for nothing. And it is the same thing with a Tory Government so far as we are concerned. Their labels are good. The Bills of past years and the Bill of this year are labelled all right, but so far as the contents of the Bill are concerned, I say, in the interests of my class, they are absolutely worthless. That has been proved; if the Bill of 1890 had solved this problem we should not be in the fix in which we are to-day, a difficulty ten thousand times worse than the question that the Bills of ten years ago were supposed to have solved. That proves that these Bills are worthless. [A VOICE: Why not vote against it?] Because there may be a little good in it. If I am hard up and want a shilling and somebody offers me a penny, I take it because it is better than nothing at all, although it would not do me the good that a shilling would. The reason why these Bills are worthless is because the Government do not tackle the question from the proper point. It is really a land question. What is required is a fair rent court. But the First Lord of the Treasury denounced the establishment of a fair rent court. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board must know that there are what are known as assessment committees. They assess the rateable value of houses; when the assessment goes up the tenants have a right to appeal and in most cases the assessment is lowered. In the case of the gas companies also the Government says they shall not go above a certain price per 1,000 feet for gas. That is a principle adopted to protect the consumer from the monopoly, and it is a good one for that reason. We want now protection for the workpeople against the slum owners. We have no fair rent court, and the slum owner goes on in his own sweet way, and the municipalities who want to clear him away have to compensate him heavily. We get no extension of time, and we do not get the land as an asset off the building. The day will come when this evil will have so spread that the Government then in power will have to take up the matter from the proper standpoint. The workman is often condemned, and if he has a bad quality there are thousands ready to pick him to pieces; but they forget that for the one bad quality he has ninety-nine good qualities. How can anybody expect the workman of to-day to be a bright and good citizen, living as he does in the slums, where the very atmosphere which he breathes is evil, and when you take into consideration his miserable surroundings? A workman may be crushed, heart-sore, sick and sorry, and walking the streets seeking employment, but a good Samaritan comes along and takes him by the hand and gives him a lift and alters his entire surroundings. What we have to do, if the Government want to turn out bright citizens, is to level up the employees more nearly to themselves, instead of keeping them down as they do to-day. Put them into decent dwellings, so as to improve their social conditions, because while they remain in the slums they will remain as they are. Alter the surroundings of the working man and you alter his disposition. The workmen are accused of spending their time in public-houses. Visit the slums to-day, and it will be found there are more public-houses there than in any other part. Is it any wonder that a man who lives and sleeps with his wife and family in one room, where everything has to be done, if he has a penny in his pocket should be tempted to spend a few hours in the glare and glitter of a public-house, rather than go to the miserable hovel he calls home? In conclusion, I certainly trust that sooner or later some Government will deal with this question in a practical manner. The reason the present Government are unable to deal with it is because they are above all the upholders of the sacred rights of property. But when those rights have gone to the extent that they have to-day in London, extortionate rents on the one hand and untold misery on the other, it is time for the Government to step in and say they have gone too far, and that they must be attacked and destroyed in order to save the nation.

*MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): The hon. Gentleman opposite has come forward on the present occasion because this Bill does not deal with the housing problem in a particular manner. He complains that the measure before us does not solve the housing problem. I have followed the debate through the various stages of this Bill studiously, and I am not aware that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, still less the Leader of the House, have ever claimed that it did solve the problem, but I venture to claim for it that it is a most practical and solid contribution towards the solution of the most difficult problem that the House has had to face for ten years, and I venture to tell the hon. Member that the Utopian Government which he hopes is going to solve the question will never succeed in doing so by one Act of Parliament alone. It can only be done by gradual legislation. It could never be done by one Bill, because in the course of one session the House would never get through more than six or seven clauses of the Bill. My hon. friend referred to the efforts of the London County Council. It has been my pleasure to be a member of the body long before my hon. friend joined us, and I should be the last to say a word against it; but as for their efforts they have not only failed to find a solution, but absolutely and hopelessly failed to offer even any practical contribution towards the solution; they have suggested putting obligations on the railway companies to run cheap trains to carry people who do not exist to places where houses have not been erected, and it is in that way that many well-meaning people have approached the solution of this difficult question. Not being able to carry out their Utopian and ideal schemes, their policy has resulted in nothing being done, and although some of us do regret that this Bill does not go a little further, we nevertheless consider that it contains a substantial and concrete contribution to the solution of this problem. I believe we shall not only have a diminution of the pressure which exists at the present moment, but a cessation of the rapacity of the slum landlord, with whom nobody has any sympathy and to whom we want to put an end. You cannot do away with him while the tenants are compelled to pay the rent he asks, but if you erect cheaper houses elsewhere the trade of the slum landlord will disappear. I earnestly hope that my hon. friend, with whom I seldom have the honour to agree, will take some profit from the experience of this effort, and will see that by tackling this problem systematically and gradually we shall offer a substantial contribution to the solution of a problem which is almost the plague of London, which is acknowledged to be pressing, but which some of our philanthropists have failed to solve, because they preferred to have nothing if they could not get everything. I desire to thank my right hon. friend for the Bill before the House.

*MR. ROBSON (South Shields): I think the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House, although we recognise in him one who, as much as ourselves, has the welfare of the masses at heart, entirely misses the force of the argument addressed against the Bill by the hon. Member for Stepney. The Government is perfectly right to proceed by steps; but all that we asked, and ask still, is that the step should be a real, genuine, and efficient step—in fact, that it should be a step forward; and our complaint against the Bill is that it is nothing of the kind. Instead of being a real and effective step forward towards the solution of the problem, it is a title and a name, and nothing more. Now that we have the Bill before us in its final form we are better able to appreciate how far we were justified on this side of the House when we pointed out that the limited scope of the Bill would be fatal to its efficiency. Ministers said when the Bill was before Committee that they were anxious to hear and accept all the Amendments that might make the Bill more workable or make it more acceptable to the local authorities invited to adopt it. That took the edge off a good deal of the criticism on the Second Reading; but it has, happily, no place on this stage of the Bill. The Committee has done its best, and the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has, with great courtesy and ability, done his best to make the Bill what it is. But according to us it remains what it was on the Second Reading—an absolutely futile measure. I say nothing against the three clauses added to the Bill. My hon. friend the Member for Stepney has made some pungent and just criticism on the clause added by the hon. Member for Chelsea. I do not stop to criticise that at all. If anything I am disposed to approve of it. The three minor clauses added to the Bill must make it a little more effective; but they do not touch the objection we urged on the Second Reading, and urge still—namely, that the Bill as it stands is not acceptable to the local authorities, and is not likely to be adopted by them. Speaking in a general sense, it will be wholly useless for the purpose for which it is intended. There are some exceptional cases, such as the offer of land made by my hon. friend the Member for Whitechapel to the County Council of London, where the Bill may be of service; but, speaking generally, I venture to say that it will be of no service at all. It is put forward as being a measure to enable local authorities to relieve their slums and congested areas by transferring the population outside. That is an excellent object. It is an object in which, I am quite certain, all those on this side of the House are extremely desirous to assist the Ministry to the utmost of their ability, but it is idle to suppose that this can be carried into effect by simply telling the local authorities that they may adopt this Bill if they please. The local authorities are conscious, and justly conscious, of the great number of difficulties in their way. These difficulties ought to be as obvious to the central authority as to the local authorities. For instance, there is the question of communication, raised on the Second Reading, between the overcrowded district and the new settlement. There is the question of jurisdiction—namely, whether the new settlement shall be placed under the jurisdiction of the district founding it or the district in which it is placed. All these are difficulties which at once occur to the mind of any local authority desirous of considering this Bill; but all these questions have been excluded—I say deliberately excluded—by the Government themselves. Without treating the Bill as one covering the whole ground, but simply as a step, each of these matters is essential in considering the efficiency of that step; but the Government have prevented us considering it entirely, because they have chosen a title so restrictive, limited as it is to a mere fraction of another Act, that any proposal to make the Bill workable and acceptable is necessarily beyond its scope, and therefore cannot be considered by the House at all. That is the complaint we make about the Bill. In the last clause there is a statement to the effect that it may be cited as the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1900. That title meets with the approval of the hon. Member for East Islington. That is a platform title, and I daresay we shall see it on electioneering leaflets in time, but it is not the title of the Bill. It is not the title which is placed at the head of the Bill, and decides whether any particular proposal is or is not within the scope of the Bill. We desired to enlarge its scope on the Second Reading, and it is very important to the House and the country to see how the Government met that suggestion, because that marks the difference—if this be a party question at all—between the two parties in regard to the Bill. What did we propose on the Second Reading? We pointed out—and I have not heard anyone seriously controvert the proposition—that you could never get the local authorities to deport their population to districts outside their areas unless you give them some guarantee as to cheap communication between the old district and the new settlement. That is a vital question to be considered in approaching this Bill. How did the Government approach it? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury rose at the end of the debate, and, dealing with the proposal in the Amendment I had the honour to move, he made a statement I listened to with rather more astonishment than I sometimes feel when I hear statements made in this House. He did not take the trouble to controvert the proposition that cheap train communication between the overcrowded district and the new settlement was essential; but he said, speaking on the advice he received from the Department, that the Cheap Trains Act of 1883 already provided whatever was fair and necessary in the way of communication between the overcrowded district and the proposed new settlement. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. I do not wish to reproach him for the mistake. He is obliged to make statements upon the information he receives, but this I will venture to conjecture. I will venture to say that the Law Officers never told him that the Cheap Trains Act was sufficient for getting communication as between the overcrowded district and the proposed new settlement. Let me remind the House of what my proposal was, and how the failure to meet it was fatal to the Bill. I pointed out that the Cheap Trains Act of 1883 is applicable only as between already settled districts. The Cheap Trains Act is not intended to apply to a measure of this kind at all. It is only intended to apply where, as between two or more districts there is already an existing deficiency in the supply of cheap train facilities to meet the already existing demand. That is the Cheap Trains Act. In the case of this Bill, any local authority proposing to adopt it finds itself faced with this dilemma: On the one hand, it cannot avail itself of the Cheap Trains Act of 1883 until the new district is fully settled; but, on the other hand, it cannot settle that new district until it is able to promise to the population going there that they shall meet with proper facilities for cheap train communication. In order to remove that dilemma, I ventured to ask the Government to extend the scope of their Bill by adopting the proposal which I put before the House, and which met with approval from a very substantial number of hon. Members opposite. My proposal was to enable the municipality to go before the Railway Commissioners or the Board of Trade, and to ask for an Order under the Cheap Trains Act in advance of the population—that is to say, an Order to anticipate the settlement of the population, so that a cheap train service should be laid on for the people who go there either contemporaneously with the settlement of the people or in advance of the people. That is not possible under the existing Act, but it seems to me so small an extension that was asked that the Government might very well have made it. When the First Lord of the Treasury said that the already existing law was adequate for the purpose he made a very serious mistake. Mark the significance of such a mistake on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. He is in this House the head of the Government, and he showed with regard to a paramount necessity in order to make this Bill efficient, that he and his colleagues were wholly uninformed or misinformed as to the existing state of the law. It shows that the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues have not considered this question as a whole, or else they would at once have been struck, as anybody is who approaches the question, that the first difficulty standing in the way is, How are you to deal with the question of communication? I must say that although the First Lord of the Treasury spoke last in the debate on the Second Reading he was, I believe, the first to import into that debate anything in the nature of party recrimination, for he certainly dealt in that wholesale. One is accustomed to it. I suppose it is a staple Parliamentary product, but I confess I was somewhat surprised that he should seek to import party recrimination into the debate while unconsciously revealing that neither he nor his colleagues had considered the initial difficulty of the question. I pass to another point which has a most important bearing on the application of the Bill. This Bill is an invitation or suggestion to the local authorities that they should part with some of their population, with the result, of course, that they would thereby diminish their rateable value. At the same time as they are called upon to part with some of their population and to diminish their rateable value they are invited to assume a somewhat substantial financial risk. They are also to be under the obligation of incurring all the trouble and anxiety which is involved in the formation of a new settlement. I tell the House as a practical man that these are all substantial and formidable impediments in the way of the adoption of this Bill. A local authority does not wish to see its population diminish, but it is apprehensive, with perhaps much better reason, of any diminution of the rateable value on which they rely for the obligations they have to meet. At the very time that they are called upon to diminish their population and their rateable value they are also called upon by this Bill to assume a new and indefinite liability in the purchase and laying out of a new building estate. These considerations would make a corporation hesitate before it undertook to carry out a scheme for the erection of workmen's dwellings. If they had been able to go to the ratepayers and say that they saw no risk attaching to such a scheme, because they would buy land at the agricultural value and give it suburban value by means of the Cheap Trains Act, that itself would practically have removed the financial risk of adopting this measure, but in the absence of any such provision the local authorities would be extremely chary before they ran the financial risk which would undoubtedly be involved, especially when it means that under existing circumstances the better part of their population will be removed and the more casual class remain. A local authority in considering whether it should apply the Act will see that if they apply the Act the ratepayers they will lose will be by no means the least remunerative class. That is an additional reason why they should hesitate to apply the Act. This Bill as it stands is opposed to the financial interests of the local authorities who are invited to adopt it. [An HON. MEMBER: No, no!] An hon. Member says "No, no!" I have no doubt that in time he will be able to deal with the arguments I address to the House, but he will see that to invite a local authority to diminish its population and its rateable value, and to undertake a new liability without any guarantee whatever of cheap communication between the new settlement and the old district, is undoubtedly opposed to the financial interest of the local authority. I venture to say that the conflict between those corporate financial interests and the philanthropic motives by which the Bill is inspired is wholly unnecessary; for if the Government had consented to enlarge the scope of their Bill so as to admit a clause enabling the Local Government Board, upon representation from the local authority concerned, to place the new settlement under the jurisdiction of the old district, the local authorities, seeing that they would then be exchanging an artificial, unhealthy rateable value in an overcrowded district for a healthy rateable value in a new and growing district, would have been stimulated to deal with this overcrowding question drastically. If a clause with this object were embodied in the Bill, it would turn what is now a futile measure into a great measure of social reform. As to compelling the local authority to exercise this power in respect of overcrowding, as in the case of insanitary dwellings—to talk of such a thing is to talk absolute nonsense. I hope that the debates on the Bill may be of more use than the Bill itself, for if it has thereby been made clear what is the real difficulty standing in the way of local authorities they will have done some service. As the Bill stands, I see no reason why we should vote against it. We have not the slightest objection to the addition by the Government of ornamental titles to the Statute-book, if that is the desire of the Government. We venture, however, to make our protest. It may be that the right hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill, when he sees that it is inoperative at a later stage, may bring in a measure to make it operative. When he does that he may depend upon it that he will meet with no inconsiderable support from Members on this side of the House.

*MR. WYLIE (Dumbartonshire): Perhaps I may be allowed to say one or two words in reference to the question of communication, to which the hon. Member for South Shields has referred as being of vital and paramount importance, and also in support of the Third Reading of this measure. Much of the success of the Bill will depend upon the travelling facilities afforded to the working classes. Some hon. Members opposite have expressed the conviction that the working classes, and especially the labouring classes, will not be able to afford the fares necessary for conveying them to and from the urban districts. The county which I represent has probably the cheapest service of workmen's trains in this or, as far as I know, any other country, and it affords a very good illustration of what can be done by energetic and intelligent railway enterprise. In Dumbartonshire hundreds of workmen travel to and from their work every day. For this they are charged 1s. per week, or 2d. per day for a double journey of about twenty-four miles, which is equal to 1d. per twelve miles of comfortable railway travelling. The trains run at convenient hours in the morning, and are waiting for the men when their work is finished at night. Owing to these great facilities hundreds of working men are enabled to enjoy the advantages of much cheaper and better situated houses than would be possible in the manufacturing districts in which they are employed. A large percentage of these working men are labourers—not perhaps on the small wages of 10s. or 12s. per week, referred to by the hon. Member for Stepney, but receiving 16s. or 20s. per week. A great many of this class avail themselves of these admirable facilities, because they find it more advantageous to pay the 1s. per week in fares than to pay the highly increased expenses in manufacturing districts. I can assure the House that these cheap rates pay the railway companies. When the competing company which secured these advantages was being promoted in Parliament it was stated before the Committee of the House of Commons that the then sole existing company, the North British, which was conveying workmen not at such a low rate as that to which I referred, but still at a very cheap rate—about eight miles per day—was earning by its service of workmen's trains at the rate of 10s. 4d. per train mile, while the average over their whole system was only at the rate of 3s. 9d. However this may be, I can assure the House on undoubted authority that the very low rate does pay the railway company, and I think this is a very good object-lesson to railway directors, because it shows that if they are willing to encourage large numbers of working men to travel morning and evening by the introduction of low fares and convenient trains it will be advantageous to their companies. It is also a very good illustration of what can be done under existing conditions and by one mode of travelling only. But the facilities for travelling are rapidly increasing. New modes are being invented; old methods are being improved. The Lord Provost of Glasgow told me that by good management of the tramways they are now able to carry ordinary passengers one and a half miles for a penny, which they expect soon to be able to increase to two miles; whilst workmen they carry at the minimum rate of three miles for a penny, and that, too, will probably soon be improved upon. Thousands of tradesmen now travel to and from their work by means of bicycles, and I believe before very long thousands more will be conveyed by motor cars. Under this aspect of the question and inasmuch as I believe this measure will probably take out of the hands of land speculators and jerry builders much of the work which has hitherto been very badly performed, I think the Bill opens up a brighter future for the working classes and for the teeming masses in our large cities and towns who are cooped up in the most unhealthy manner in respect of their homes and their surroundings, upon which so much of their physical and moral welfare depends. I think we may congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board on having introduced this unpretentious but very useful measure, and on the able and conciliatory manner in which he has conducted it through its various stages. I give my cordial support to the third reading.

*Mr. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): When the Second Reading of this Bill was before the House I ventured to offer a few observations upon its shortcomings, and I desire to do the same to-night. Although the measure has passed through various stages it is still very defective, and in my opinion will be of no practical use to the corporations throughout the country. The practical and eloquent speech of the hon. Member for Stepney shows that what is wanted in reference to the housing of the working classes is not a Bill enabling local authorities to do that which they never will do, namely—to invest their money and run the risk of speculative property outside their boundaries, but some practical measure which shall give to the local authorities power to deal with the slum property which exists in every town. The hon. Member for Stepney, with his practical experience, has shown that this measure cannot deal with the slum property. An argument used by the hon. Member for East Islington about the London County Council desiring to have facilities for cheap railway fares outside the present area admits of that argument for this reason. The London County Council have found from experience that they cannot go on pulling down slum property in London under Part 1 of the Act of 1890 without an enormous cost to the rates. I have said before there is a possibility of this Bill being applied to London. It may be; but I cannot understand that the County Council should go on spending money outside its own area to provide houses for the working classes living in the inner parts of this great city. What I do say is, that unless a measure is brought in by this or some other Government altering the existing law you will never deal with the question of the housing of the poor in the manner in which it should be dealt with—namely, by doing away with slum property. I have had some experience in this matter. In the town which I have the honour to represent we have a slum property, and I have sat on a Committee for a considerable time trying to effect some improvement in this property, but it is impossible under the complicated Sections 6, 8, and 9, of the Act of 1890, for any local authority to deal with such slum property except at an enormous cost to the rates. I heard the speech on the Second Reading of the President of the Local Government Board. The right hon. Gentleman pictured in glowing terms the powers which exist under the Act of 1890; he showed what could be done and how to do it. I ask him, has he had any experience on any local authority in dealing with this slum property? That is a practical question, because it is impossible to carry out this work if the interests of existing ratepayers are to be safeguarded. I should like to call attention to how this Bill will apply to some of our large municipalities. The power under this Bill is to enable local authorities to purchase land outside their boundaries. Take Leeds. There the housing of the working classes is as difficult as in London, but there is no want of land. The area of Leeds is 21,552 acres; it is equal in area to the ten new boroughs on the north side of the Thames —Islington, Hampstead, St. Pancras, Marylebone, Paddington, Kensington, Hammersmith, Greater Westminster, Chelsea, and Fulham. What is the use of passing a measure to permit Leeds to buy land outside its own area when it has crying evils within its area that it cannot deal with because of the existing law? Then take Sheffield. Sheffield has 19,000 acres, and there the same difficult problem exists. Sheffield is also equal to ten of the new London boroughs; Liverpool is equal to eight; Birmingham, Nottingham, and Bristol are equal to five. Therefore there is plenty of land within these boroughs, but the councils will not go on spending money in costly schemes at the expense of the existing ratepayers. I do not wish to make this a party question, but it is no use citing the number of Bills the Conservatives have brought in. What we, as representatives of the local authorities, want are practical measures of a tangible character which can be put into force and at a cheap rate. I quite agree with the hon. Member for South Shields that you cannot get the small boroughs of 3,000, 4,000, or 5,000 acres to undertake to spend money outside their areas. They will not buy land for building at a cost of thousands of pounds, with the risk of a cost to the rates, unless they can get complete control and jurisdiction over that area. All the money now spent in our boroughs is for the purpose of inducing people to come into the boroughs, and not to send them outside. This measure simply permits the boroughs to buy land outside, and, therefore, there is no chance of it being put into effect. There is only one other matter to which I wish to refer, and that is in reference to the compensation question. At a meeting to-day of the municipal corporations there was a strong feeling expressed that it was unfair that corporations should have to compensate landowners to the extent of 10 per cent. beyond the valuation. The Government refused to accept an Amendment moved from this side of the House limiting that compensation, and I contend that if they really wished to make this measure practicable they should have accepted some of the important Amendments which would cheapen the cost in the event of the local authorities putting the Bill into operation. I hope the time will soon arrive when there will be a Government in power which will deal with this question in a manner which will be effective and a lasting boon to the community, and by which the matter will be settled for a great many years to come.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): I have not ventured to address the House on this Bill either at the Committee stage or on the Second Reading, and I rise to-night only to make one or two practical suggestions in addition to those which have been offered not alone from this, but also from the other side of the House. Before I deal with the points in which I am specially interested I want to say this: The country has been agitated during the last four or five years with the housing problem on its moral, social, and physical sides. In the village as in the town, and especially in London, we have hoped that the Government, face to face with this agitation, would bring forward a Bill grappling with the problem much better than this Bill does, and when the country hears, as it will hear, especially after the Bill has been in operation a year, that all this agitation and the sentimental articles in the papers, from The Times downwards, have resulted simply in this elementary measure, which goes only a little way on the right road, it will come to the conclusion that the Government's mountain has laboured and produced a ridiculous mouse. I venture to think that the Government, face to face with the need for better housing, face to face with the demand for wider powers on the part of local authorities, could have done better than they have done, even accepting the Bill as they originally brought it in. They might have accepted several Amendments from the hon. Member for South Shields, and they ought not to have refused some of the Amendments moved by the hon. Member for Stepney, with whose practical knowledge, sympathy, and speeches in regard to this question I entirely associate myself. But the Government have resolved to restrict this Bill to the simple question of allowing local authorities to go outside their municipal jusisdiction for housing purposes. That, on the face of it, seems a plausible, practical, and remedial thing to do, but when we know that this new power is circumscribed by the adoptive and optional character of the Bill, a considerable amount of the plausible benefit which we at first thought this Bill might confer is removed. My objection to the Bill is that it is optional in its adoption, and unless a local authority is compelled by the indignation of the inhabitants to adopt the Bill there will be very little improvement effected by this measure. The Bill is very limited in its scope, and in practice it will be found to apply to a very limited area. Unless the personnel of parish, district, and county councils is considerably altered, I do not expect to see rural elysiums cropping up in bricks and mortar for the ideal lodging of agricultural labourers. I am positively convinced that unless some of the landlords who dominate parish, district, and county councils are forced to abandon their hidebound objections to agricultural labourers being better housed, this Bill will be a dead letter in rural districts. The Bill and the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman ignore the salient fact that some of the worst slum-ridden districts in the provinces and in London are governed by the worst of slum-owners, who, on the local authorities who have to put this Act into operation, will do everything within their power to keep the poor people in the slums, because a bigger profit can be made out of them there than in a district two or three miles outside the City jurisdiction. This Bill will not force the slum-owner, who is also a parish, district, or county councillor, to depart from his own interest, and that will make against the extension of the Bill. There is no compulsion which the central authority can apply to the local authority which neglects its duty in regard to the housing of the poor, and the net effect of the measure spread over the next few years will be about as great in the rehousing of the poor as that of the Workmen's Dwellings Acquisition Bill of two years ago—it will be practically nil. Let me go a bit further. The Bill applies to very few local authorities, as the bulk of them do not want to go outside their own areas for land for housing purposes. Some of the worst slums are in districts which have not yet reached the maximum of their municipal expansion, and this Bill will not touch those places to any appreciable extent. In a word, with the exception of a few cities such as Sheffield and Birmingham, and perhaps Leeds to some extent, this Bill applies to London in the main. Let me deal with its application to London. Although this Bill mainly applies to London, its beneficial features will be absolutely inoperative unless the Government follow up this Bill by an immediate alteration—I would suggest the revocation—of the Standing Orders that prevent the London County Council, the housing authority, having that free hand in the extension of municipal electric traction which the County Council ought to enjoy. Unless by an alteration of the Standing Orders of this House the veto is removed by which the vestries prevent the London County Council going from the centre of London to the area outside where this Bill can apply, the measure so far as London is concerned for the next five years will be a dead letter. How do I prove that? Supposing the London County Council were to buy 100 acres at Mitcham for artisans' dwellings. Suppose further the Council, not being the road authority between Westminster and Mitcham, want to get the people who are congested at Westminster to the artisans' colonies which the right hon. Gentleman thinks under this Bill the Council will be able to erect at Mitcham. That thought of the right hon. Gentleman is ideal, it is optimistic, for the facts are these: Unless you make the London County Council, which is the tramway and housing authority, also the road authority, the respectable people of Wandsworth, who do not want the poor to come between the wind and their nobility, will veto any proposal the Council may make for electric traction through their area, with the result that the Bill will be hung up, the housing schemes suspended, and this measure will be waste-paper. I respectfully suggest to the House of Commons and to the President of the Local Government Board that if this Bill is to do any good—and it will do most good to London if anywhere—that good cannot be accomplished unless the road authority in London is also the housing and the traction authority. If the veto of the vestries is not removed we shall have the respectable retired grocer of Balham, the respectable coal-merchant of Tooting, and the company-promoter who lives on the borders of Mitcham saying, "We do not want Mr. Chaplin's Bill; we do not want these colonies of workmen outside. But we will not object to it on the merits of the housing scheme. We will put up our friends on the local vestry to say that traction is not wanted in this neighbourhood; we will not pay the sum necessary to widen the streets." They will have no end of factitious and fictitious excuses, and the result will be that the Council will be unable to achieve the objects of this Bill. I agree with the remarks of the hon. Member for Stepney as to the effect of the environment of working men on their character, and the effect of better houses upon men, women, and children. I agree that Part I might have been amended, and Part II. could have been improved almost beyond recognition. This Bill could have been stiffened if the Government had desired it, because the House was ready to accept anything which the Government was willing to put forward. But, notwithstanding this, I still think that so far as London and many big cities are concerned the solution of the housing problem, to a great extent, will be found less in rehousing the dishoused poor in insanitary areas than it will be found in throwing the responsibility upon local authorities of providing cheap and rapid electric traction in order to distribute the poor themselves over a wider area than that congested area in which they now live. Dealing with this problem is like dealing with manure, which is no good in heaps, but is very beneficial spread over a lot of ground. I believe that relief to these congested districts will come to a great extent from cheap and rapid electric traction. The President of the Local Government Board must realise that, concurrently with his desire for this Bill to allow local authorities to deal with this problem outside their own area, there is growing up a strong objection to localities — and especially municipal authorities—getting quicker and better electric traction in their hands. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to help the housing of the poor he will have to take no notice of this spurious agitation against municipal trading in regard to electric traction. If he desires to deal effectively with this question he must take no notice of the gentlemen who have caused the two Houses of Parliament to institute a joint Committee, the object of which is to get electric traction in the hands of companies and monopolies, when, if it were placed in the hands of local or municipal authorities, with the necessary control over the roads, it would do more good in one year in the way of settling the housing problem than this Bill will do in nine or ten years. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire made an admirable and excellent speech, but it had very little relevance to this Bill or to the housing problem. I think his speech would have been more appropriate when the Cheap Trains Bill was before the House. The hon. Member has stated that the railway companies in Scotland had been compelled to carry people twenty miles for twopence, and what is good enough for Dumbartonshire is good enough for London. [AN HON. MEMBER: It is done now in London.] Yes, I know that the Great Eastern Railway do it, but they have done it more to take colonies of workmen to help them to pay for their line. The Great Eastern Railway was then almost bankrupt, and they paid their dividends by giving cheap trains. But one swallow does not make a summer, and all the other railway companies do not do the same as the Great Eastern Railway have done. The Government did a great deal to prevent the success of this Bill when they asked their supporters to throw out the hon. Member for West Islington's Cheap Trains Bill, which was the necessary complement to any Housing Bill whether under Part I., Part II., or Part III. The President of the Local Government Board has given us the power to go outside, providing the local authorities are willing; but by the rejection of the Cheap Trains Bill the Government have denied the workmen, whom they expect to benefit, the opportunity of that cheap and rapid transit which ought to precede the passing of this Bill. What the Government have given with the left hand they have taken away with the right by not giving the facilities to compel railway companies to provide these cheap fares, which they ought to have done. I wish to say a word or two with regard to one portion of London in particular. I allude to Chelsea. If we have to have landlords I would rather have a big landlord than a small one. The most objectionable sort of landlords I know are those who belong to the retired grocer class with religious proclivities, who have invested their money in bricks and mortar in which the poor live, and who now grind the faces of the poor. If I am to choose a good landlord, I would rather have a large one, and one of the best is Lord Cadogan, or the Duke of Westminster, or the Duke of Bedford. But what happens in these cases? Lord Cadogan has converted Chelsea during the last twenty years from being a working class district into a sort of South-Western Belgravia and a middle and upper class flatland. He has turned all the workmen out of Chelsea for the improvement and betterment of his property, and his dominion over Chelsea, benevolent though he may think it, has been a positive curse to the labourers and the artisans and the men who previously lived in Chelsea and near to their work. It seems to me that the day is not far distant when you will have to apply to the Dukes of Westminster and Bedford and Earl Cadogan, who are improving the poor off the face of this earth for the benefit of their property, the same provisions as are now applied to railway companies, and which you are now seeking to apply to the County Council, and which you impose upon the School Board when they pull down houses for the building of polytechnics, and thus displace the poor. You are going to segregate this vast city into parishes of the poor and parishes of the rich, which, from the point of view of housing, is a mistake, and from the point of view of social development will be a disaster. By this policy you are bringing about a division of the classes, which you have always pretended that you are anxious to avert, and thus you are bringing about in London one of the worst social characteristics that it is possible to conceive. I sincerely trust that my hint to my friend Earl Cadogan will be conveyed to him by his friends in the spirit it which it is given, and that we shall no longer see the Duke of Westminster and Earl Cadogan displacing the working class of Chelsea, and compelling them to go into portions of Fulham and into my constituency of Battersea. [An HON. MEMBER: But they are Radicals.] That is not so, for they are of the very poorest class, and the very poor are almost always more Tory than the rich; they are chloroformed by the publicans, and by beer and blankets, and they are the dependents of South African millionaires, who tell them that it is their business to support gentlemen who have made their money in Africa and who come over here touting for a coronet, while if they asked for such a thing in their own land they would be put in prison instead. This Bill brings no pressure to bear upon the rich landlord, nor upon a reluctant local authority. It does not deal with a reluctant district council dominated by a landlord. What remedy does it bring to the dock labourer and the casual worker in the East End of London? Why, none at all. My hon. friend the Member for Stepney asked for the establishment of a fair rent court, but that was refused. There are hundreds of foreigners who are exacting more money out of those who reside in small tenements in the East, and inflicting greater hardships upon the poor, than ever Isaac Gordon made out of his clients. This kind of thing has to be stopped, because if it is not stopped we shall see the beginning of such an agitation that I trust we never shall witness in the East End of London. The last thing I have to say is in regard to that infamous clause which provides that local authorities may buy land at the ratepayers' expense, and when the money has been captured, the landowners get on the district council and lease the land bought at the ratepayers' expense to traffickers in land, who will make a profit out of it without incurring the responsibility of purchase. That is a mischievous blot on this Bill. This measure was said to be brought in to help the costermonger, the dock labourer, and the poor men who had to labour about Covent Garden and Drury Lane, but it will not help them at all. They cannot go to live at Tooting, Richmond, or Kingston. This Bill is another instance of that vicious class of legislation which the Government have in more than one respect introduced. It is another instance of giving to him that hath and taking from him that hath not. It helps the clerk and the higher paid workman, who feel less the pressure of congestion than the stevedore, the waiter, and the footman in the West End. [An HON. MEMBER: It makes more room.] Yes; but it is to such a very small extent, that is hardly worth the trouble of drafting a Bill to provide it. This measure does not grapple with the difficulty, and does not provide the remedy which some of us thought it would provide. It enables local authorities to go outside their areas to do what they have not the power to do inside. That is precisely what provincial districts do not want, and, so far as London is concerned, this provision is rendered useless by the fact that the London County Council will not be able to go out of their district unless this Standing Order is revoked. I wish to make a final suggestion. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he intends proceeding with the revocation of the Standing Order, and, if he cannot do that, will he promise to bring in a Bill next session to enable the county council to be the road as well as the housing authority? This Bill whispers housing reform to the ear and breaks it to the hope of every poor workman.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The hon. Member for South Shields has complained that this Bill is a title and a name, and nothing more. He also says that every Amendment which would have made the Bill a reality has been excluded. I doubt very much whether the points raised by the hon. Member could have been inserted in the Bill even if its scope had been altered in the manner he suggested. Why did the hon. Member for South Shields not try to move some Instructions upon these points? There was at least a possibility that he might have succeeded, and these questions could have been raised. All I have to say is that no Instructions of any kind were moved, and I doubt whether any single Instruction, if so placed upon the Paper, would have achieved the object which hon. Members opposite have in view. The hon. Member for Battersea says the Bill could have been stiffened if we had been willing to accept some of the various Amendments which were put down. We heard a good deal upon the Second Reading of the Bill about a number of comprehensive Amendments which were to be moved in Committee, but why were none of them moved? I waited in daily expectation to hear what those comprehensive Amendments were which were going to transform this Bill into a great and comprehensive measure, but they never came. I can count on my fingers the serious suggestions which have been offered by hon. Gentlemen opposite. One of them was the extension of the period for the repayment of loans. But if that had been carried it would have been absolutely trivial. The hon. Member for Hoxton admitted that the Amendment which I accepted at his hands would do ten times more to assist the local authorities in giving effect to this measure than any other Amendment—than if I had accepted all the Amendments which were moved for extending the period of the loans. But even on that point hon. Gentlemen must remember that their proposals were opposed and objected to by all the greatest financial authorities sitting upon their own side of the House. With regard to the question of locomotion, the hon. Member for South Shields has said that what is wanted is a change in the law. My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade and myself had the pleasure of receiving a deputation from the County Council upon this subject not many days ago. The President of the Board of Trade explained to that deputation the provision made by the existing law. I think he made out a convincing case that all they required could be obtained without any changes in the law under the present law, and he gave them assurances which, as far as I can judge, were received with satisfaction and were considered sufficient by the members of the County Council who formed the deputation. The hon. Member for Battersea has raised another question which is of even more importance than the question of cheap trains. He has pointed out what is the fact, that under Standing Order 22 very great difficulties may be placed in the way of the County Council in London in case they wish to make a tramway beyond their own area. The effect of that Standing Order is that the consent of any outside authority is an absolute condition before any Bill upon this subject can be introduced. My right hon. friend and myself have considered this question most carefully, and, after a conference with the Chairmen of Committees in both Houses, I am in a position to say that the Government are willing to make such alterations in that Standing Order and propose them in due course as will modify those restrictions and allow the question to be brought before Parliament and leave to the Committee the decision as to whether the matter should go forward or not. I do not know that there are many other questions with which I ought to deal in reply to what has been said. I am very strongly of opinion myself that when these questions were first discussed upon the introduction of the Bill, when it was stated so freely by many hon. Members opposite that this was a small, inadequate, futile, and absolutely ridiculous measure as an amendment of the law, nine-tenths of the hon. Gentlemen who made those statements were in entire ignorance—or, if not, they were singularly ill-informed—as to the existing state of the law. I have endeavoured, to the best of my ability, since these discussions began to make public and bring home to the minds of those interested in this question how immense, how wide, and how enormous are the powers which are already vested by law in the local authorities. I am pretty certain in my own mind that the real reason why, during the passing of this Bill through Committee, we have had none of those comprehensive Amendments which were foreshadowed was that the more hon. Gentlemen opposite made themselves thoroughly acquainted with this subject the more difficult they found it to frame any Amendments which were not already dealt with under the existing law upon this subject, or which were not provided for by the changes made by the present Bill. As regards London, to which the hon. Member for Battersea has referred, I hope for much from the new boroughs which are about to be constituted. With regard to districts outside the metropolis, I hope that the publicity which has been given to this question by the discussions in this House may lead to greater activity upon their part. Say what you will upon this question, and do what you will to try and extend the law, it is, after all, upon the action of the local authorities and the way in which they perform their duty that we must rely. It becomes daily and hourly more apparent that what really is wanted in regard to this question is a more effective administration of the existing law, rather than new measures of legislation.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I am very sorry to have to rise to discuss the Third Reading of this Bill at so late an hour, but I hope we shall have a further opportunity of considering this measure before the Third Reading is taken. I think that would be a convenient course to the House for this reason if for no other reason, that the Bill as it is before us at present is imperfect and incomplete. Moreover, the Bill has never been reprinted since those clauses were added to it on the Report stage, and it is very inconvenient at this stage of the Bill to have before us an imperfect transcript of the Bill which the Government propose to place upon the Statute-book. When I went to get a copy of this Bill I was surprised to find that the clauses added on the Report stage were not added. I hope, therefore, we shall have an opportunity of considering the Bill in its complete form before the Third Reading is carried. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, in the speech which he has just made, has referred to the absence of certain action on the part of hon. Members on this side of the House with reference both to Instructions and Amendments, and he suggested that if we desired very large powers to be added to this Bill we should have taken more opportunities of putting down Instructions. The right hon. Gentleman seems to forget that the opportunity of putting down Instructions was limited, because that stage of the Bill was not expected to be so short. I remember one evening we were not expecting this Bill to be taken at all by the House, and when I came back I found that one stage of the measure had been taken unexpectedly. Of course that shut out the possibility of putting down certain Instructions which would otherwise have possibly been put down. I do not say that this was designedly done, but it put us at a disadvantage with reference to the addition of further Instructions which might have been put down to extend the Bill, as was desired by many hon. Members on this side of the House. There were many Amendments of substance which we desired to move, but which were unfortunately shut out by the narrow title and narrow purview of the Bill itself. Hon. Members of considerable position in the party to which I have the honour to belong, men of most moderate views, have declared that this evil is so great, and that the difficulties and dangers of bad housing of the people are becoming such serious questions affecting the social condition of the people, that they are prepared to take even revolutionary steps to amend the present condition of things. When that spirit exists, it is more than disappointing, for it is absolutely disheartening to have a measure brought in and discussed, and which is described as a Bill for housing the working classes, which, by its very title and drafting, prevents Amendments of a large and generous character being put upon the Paper. Then we come to the question in connection with this Bill of what can be done under it. There were several points that I wished to raise myself, and I am sorry to have to say, with reference to the Bill itself, I regard it with great disappointment. It does not answer the expectations I had formed of the measure that would be introduced. The Bill has not met, after all, the great difficulty we have to face in this matter in order to take poor people out of bad and insanitary houses. There are plenty of powers on the Statute-book for turning people out of bad houses and for shutting up those houses; but what we want is power to re-house the people, and this Bill does not give us that power to any appreciable extent in the rural districts, and it gives us that power under very unfortunate conditions even in large cities and in London. I am very anxious that we should consider this Bill fully and thoroughly before it passes to another House, and I think it is advisable that we should discuss it at much greater length. The right hon. Gentleman says it is desirable that the public outside should understand the Bill thoroughly; but for that purpose so far we have had very small opportunities of discussing the measure. With reference to the re-housing difficulty in London the Bill gives the local authorities opportunities of re-housing by taking them outside their area. But the taking of them outside the present areas under existing conditions is almost impossible You cannot take people outside the areas of these local authorities——

It being Midnight, Mr. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the Business, whereupon—

MR. CHAPLIN rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: May I ask the noble Marquess opposite whether the Government have any further news from China?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I regret very much to say that we have no news whatever. Of course, as the noble Lord is well aware, there are certain items of news current this afternoon in London, but they do not come from the Government, and, confining myself entirely to the question the noble Lord has asked me, I can only say that we have no news at all.

MILITIA ESTABLISHMENT—STATISTICS.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I rise to ask the Secretary of State for War (1) to what extent the Militia is below its establishment at the present time; (2) of those serving, how many so-called Militiamen are serving in Great Britain, and of these how many are below twenty and eighteen years of age; (3) what force of Militia Infantry, deducting Militiamen under twenty years of age, and making an average allowance for casualties and absentees, could at the present time be put in the field for the home defence of the United Kingdom. In putting this question to my noble friend, I have no desire at all to revive the discussion on the Militia Ballot Bill. I do not wish to ask your Lordships to consider whether the Militia Ballot Bill or the promise of clean clothes which was given by my noble friend the Secretary of State for War will be the more likely to fill the chronic vacancies in the Militia. But I should like to clear up a personal matter. I am, unfortunately, very deaf, and I did not hear what the noble Marquess said in answer to the remarks I made in the recent discussion; but on reading his speech I find that he spoke of my inability to recognise any merit in any measures except those which I myself initiated. That is a very general assertion, and I therefore ask the noble Marquess to condescend to particulars, and to name the measures I have initiated bearing upon this question which I prefer to the measures proposed by the Government. As to the strength of the Militia, I have received a communication from an officer thoroughly conversant with the state of things in one district, in which he states that I ought to have asked how many Militiamen were below sixteen. I do not know who it comes from, but I hold in my hand another letter, written on official paper but anonymous, in which it is stated that in a certain district the actual strength of the Militia is 5,655, while the establishment proper is 9,255, so that in that particular district the Militia is below its proper strength by 3,600. The writer goes on to say that the number of captains is three-fourths of the establishment, and that the Militia are now being trained in great part by subalterns, which accounts for the adverse criticism recently passed by the Commander-in-Chief as to their efficiency.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, the noble Earl began by asking me for an explanation of a passage which he quoted—I have no doubt correctly—from the speech I delivered the other evening when his motion in favour of the Militia ballot was debated. The noble Earl on that occasion pressed upon your Lordships the desirability of having recourse to the Militia ballot. I, on the contrary, asked your Lordships to believe that other measures having important effects upon the efficiency and strength of the Militia force should be tried before there was any question of having resort to the ballot, and at the end of my remarks I told the noble Earl that I thought he was unable to see any merit in any measure except that which he was himself pressing upon the House.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Initiating.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: The noble Earl presses the word "initiating." He certainly initiated it on that occasion, at any rate. He refused to admit that our measures had any merit, but I am glad the House thought with us and came to the conclusion at which we had arrived. The noble Earl a few moments ago called my attention to a case in which an anonymous informant had told him that in a particular district the Militia was to an alarming extent below its strength. I cannot identify the case, but if the noble Earl chooses to supply me with the necessary information I will make inquiries. I will now answer the questions on the Paper. I may explain that the figures which I shall give him will be exclusive of the permanent staff of the Militia and of the Militia officers. The establishment of the Militia is 124,273. The number of men now serving with the Militia is 91,824, but in addition to those there are about 12,000 Militia Reservists who are now serving with the Line. If those be added the deficiency is increased from about 20,000 to about 32,000.

THE EARL OF WEYMSS: Are they not exclusive of the establishment?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Including the Militia Reservists the deficiency will be 32,000, and excluding them, 20,000. Of the Militia serving at home there are in Great Britain 57,000, and in Ireland 13,000. Of the 57,000 in Great Britain there are, under the age of twenty, 21,000, of whom 5,000 are under the age of eighteen. Of the 13,000 in Ireland 5,500 are under twenty and of those 1,400 are under eighteen. Then, my Lords, we come to the Infantry Militia. The Infantry Militia in the United Kingdom numbers 54,000, of whom 22,000 are under twenty. About 2,700 would represent the normal deduction to be made from that number on account of sick. All that I need add is that for the purpose of calculating the number of men who can be put into the field for the home defence of the United Kingdom, we should certainly not deduct all men below the age of twenty. No such deduction has, to the best of my belief, ever been made.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I beg to thank the noble Marquess for the statement he has just made. Perhaps he will pardon me if I again refer to the personal matter I mentioned when asking the question. My noble friend has just stated that what he said referred to the measure that I was pressing on the House. What the noble Marquess really said was that I could see no merit in any measure that I did not myself initiate. What I want to point out is that I had nothing whatever to do with the initiation of the measure for the Militia ballot. I was simply pressing on the Government the measure which they themselves initiated.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT (1897) EXTENSION BILL.

Amendment reported (according to Order).

LORD HERRIES pointed out that the first clause provided, amongst other things, that where the contractor provided and used machinery driven by mechanical power for the purposes of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, he, and he alone, should be liable under the Act to pay compensation to any workman employed by him on such work. He proposed that the words "horses or" should be inserted before the word "machinery." He could not understand why, if a contractor made use of machinery, the contractor should be liable to pay compensation, whereas if he made use of horse power the liability should fall on the employer and not on the contractor. They had been told that the difficulty could be got over by insurance, but it would be impossible for the employer to insure the workpeople of the contractor against accidents. Moreover, the clause as it at present stood would give rise to a great deal of litigation as to when the employment began. Supposing, for instance, a man employed a contractor with a self-binder to cut a field of corn, would the liability for compensation begin when the contractor was attaching the horse to the self-binder, or when he entered the field? He ventured to think that many legal questions of this kind might arise. If one of the horses employed by a contractor was vicious and kicked and injured somebody, surely the man who employed the contractor could not be considered liable. He had been told that this question was threshed out in the Committee of the House of Commons, but from inquiries he had ascertained from a Member for an agricultural district that the point had never been raised at all. The Amendment was in no way opposed to the principle of the Bill, and he hoped the noble Viscount would accept it.

Amendment moved—

"In page 1, line 15, after 'uses' to insert 'horses or.'"—(Lord Herries.)

VISCOUNT CROSS: Although I confess that I have considerable sympathy with the Amendment, I am afraid I cannot accept it. The great object of the Bill is to avoid litigation, and the Department which I represent are of opinion that the words of the Bill as it stands are quite clear and not likely to lead to litigation. Although it is true that some of these machines are driven by horses, a good many of the horses may belong to the farmer himself.

LORD HERRIES pointed out that the clause, as he proposed to amend it, would read, "provided that where the contractor provides and uses horses or machinery."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the Amendment would be a great improvement to the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY) said that in his opinion the Amendment was a very reasonable one. If a contractor's horse kicked a man the contractor ought to be liable for the injury just as much as he would be liable for an injury caused by the machinery he used.

LORD ALVERSTONE said it would be better not to insert the words in the Amendment. He thought the difficulty which the Board of Agriculture must have felt was that if the words "horses or" were inserted there would be a difference in the case of a man kicked by the farmer's horse and a man kicked by the contractor's horse. It would be better not to draw this distinction.

LORD HENEAGE said that, under the clause as it now stood, if a man was kicked by the contractor's horse he would obtain compensation from the farmer, who might then recover it from the contractor to whom the horse belonged. He supported the Amendment. If the contractor provided and used horses, he alone should be liable to compensate just in the same way as if he provided machinery.

On Question, "That the words 'horses or' be here inserted," their Lordships divided:—Contents, 22; Not-Contents, 25.

Bill to be read 3ª on Monday next.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIABILITY OF SHIPOWNERS AND OTHERS) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1, agreed to,

Clause 2 :—

LORD MACNAGHTEN said he did not think there would be any objection to his Amendment, which he explained on the previous evening. It provided that a ship could not be deemed to have been within the area laid down in the Bill by reason only that it had been built or fitted out within such area.

Amendment moved—

"In clause 2, line 27, after 'has' to insert 'been built or fitted out within such area or that it has.'"—(Lord Macnaghten.)

LORD HENEAGE said that, so far as he was concerned, he had no objection to the Amendment. It appeared a fair and reasonable one, and he gladly accepted it.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

LORD ALVERSTONE: I wish to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade whether Her Majesty's Government have really considered what the effect of this clause is. I pointed out when I was in the House of Commons that the clause was practically unworkable. It proposes that dock companies shall get immunity from liability for accidents to the same extent that shipowners now do under the Limitation of Liability Acts. I will quote one instance as an illustration of what I mean. Supposing a dock-master, by mismanagement of sluices, lets out the water, and half-a-dozen ships are grounded and the goods injured, the liability of the dock company is to be limited to £8 a ton, not by any relation to their own property, but by relation to the ship of largest size that has gone into the dock during the previous five years. If this principle is going to be admitted there is no reason why the liability of railway companies and other contracting bodies should not be limited in the same manner. I hope before your Lordships pass this clause you will see that by it you are introducing the principle—the entirely new principle—of limiting liability for dock companies and other undertakings without the least reference to the same considerations as those which limit the liability in the case of shipowners; the standard that is set up has not the slightest relation either to the obligation of the dock company or the breach of duty they commit. I do not think such a change in the law ought to be made except after full consideration by the Government of the day. I should like the noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade to state the reason for this clause. It is said to be a bargain between the shipowners and the dock companies, but we have the rights of the goods owners to protect. There may be damage to the extent of thousands of pounds done to goods, but the goods owners get no consideration under this Bill.

EARL EGERTON: While I cannot defend the clause upon any logical principle, I should like to explain that it is the result of agreement between dock-owners and shipowners. It does not limit the amount of damages in an ordinary accident, but is designed to meet such accidents as the one which occurred two years ago in the Manchester Ship Canal. It will be remembered that the ship Harold, instead of obeying orders and going astern, went ahead and charged the dock gates with such force that they were carried away. Had it not been for the presence of mind of the man in charge of the dock, who closed the gates immediately, the water for several miles would have been let out and enormous damage caused. It was felt on either side that there should be some limit to the liability of the shipowner and the dockowner in accidents of an exceptional nature, and this limit the clause provides, though, speaking on behalf of dock-owners, I would have preferred a specified limit of, say, £50,000 or £100,000.

LORD AVEBURY: The noble Lord who is in charge of this Bill said the clause had been agreed to by all those who were interested. I should like to know if merchants and insurers, who are quite as much interested in the matter as shipowners and dock companies, are in any way parties to the agreement represented by the clause.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: The criticisms upon this clause seem to imply a greater amount of affection for it on the part of the Board of Trade than really exists. I ventured yesterday to explain the position of the Board of Trade in regard to the clause. If the clause has to be defended upon its merits the defence must come from the noble Lord who is responsible for the Bill. The Board of Trade are not committed to this clause. Their position is this—they are aware that this is a Bill which is ardently desired by the two parties to this transaction, but whether their interests ought to prevail over the interests of those whom the noble Lord behind me has mentioned is a matter really for the House. I do not make myself responsible for the clause, nor do I in any way defend it. At the same time, I am bound to say that to strike out the clause would be tantamount to rejecting the Bill. If the clause goes to a division, I shall feel bound, after what I said yesterday, to vote for the clause; but I do not think this expression of opinion on my part ought to be held to bind the Government to vote in the same direction.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): When I addressed your Lordships yesterday I spoke under some reserve. I certainly was under the impression that the noble and learned Lord behind me, the late Attorney General, had spoken on behalf of the Government in support of the clause in another place. Now, however, I feel perfectly free to express my opinion. A more monstrous and more ridiculous provision than that contained in this clause I have never heard in my life, and if the question is put, "that the clause stand part of the Bill," I shall certainly say "not content."

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: This is not a specimen of a very united Government. We have heard to-day what is to me an entirely new theory as to the responsibility of the different members of the Government. The noble Lord who represents the Board of Trade has stated that the Board of Trade do not particularly like this clause. That may be, but they take the responsibility of giving their assistance to pass the Bill through Parliament, and therefore they become responsible for it.

*LORD HENEAGE: I cannot help thinking that an inconvenient course has been adopted in allowing the Second Reading to pass unchallenged, thus approving of the principle of limitation, and raising the question at the present stage. I came down yesterday fully prepared to discuss the Bill on its merits, and so far as I could see there was no opposition except from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who said he did not wish to disturb the unanimity of the House. We approved yesterday of the principle that there was to be limitation, and the only question was how was that limitation to take place. The noble and learned Lord the late Attorney General objects to the second clause of this Bill. I think I must remind him that on the Second Reading in another place, after approving of the first clause of the Bill, he said—

> "All I say is that it does seem to me that the dock company has some right to say to the shipowner, 'If you ask that when a ship runs down the dock gates its liability shall be limited to £8 a ton, there ought at least to be some reciprocity.'"

It was on the basis of such a claim that this arrangement — workable, though utterly illogical—was arrived at by the shipowners and the dock companies. No alternative proposition of any kind whatever was made in the House of Commons, nor by the Law Officers of the Crown in the Standing Committee; and every alternative proposition suggested when the Bill came back from the Standing Committee was thoroughly discussed, and, with one or two exceptions, rejected. What would the noble Lord have us do? We have got to find an agreement, and a basis for that agreement. It would be impossible to make the whole dock liable, because you would have to make the whole fleet of the shipowners liable in the alternative case. The parties interested have endeavoured to find a fair basis, and what they have done is to substitute for the dock as the basis the largest ship that trades with that port. The compensation that will be paid will be exactly the same as if the damage had been committed by the largest ship in the dock. It may be said that that is a rough-and-ready estimate, but it has been arrived at by practical business men not fond of litigation. For my part I think there is less likelihood of litigation when men of common sense enter into a common sense agreement than there is in many of the laws that are passed by Parliament, even when they are drafted by the most learned lawyers. There will be no difficulty whatever. The largest ship that enters a dock is well known to everybody in the vicinity of the port, and if it is not known the information can very easily be obtained from the Customs or Board of Trade officers at the port. I was asked by my noble friend near me (Lord Avebury) whether the goods-owners had been consulted in this matter. I do not know that chambers of commerce have been consulted, but the underwriters, who are really responsible for these goods and to whom this point is of much greater importance, have been, and agree as to the advisability of passing this Bill.

On Question, "That Clause 2, as amended, stand part of the Bill," their Lordships divided:—Contents, 27; Not-Contents, 18.

[THIRD READING.]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the Third time."—(Lord James of Hereford.)

On Question agreed to, Bill read 3ª accordingly.

Moved, "That the Bill do pass."—(Lord James of Hereford.)

LORD DE RAMSEY: The Amendment standing in my name to Clause 10 virtually explains itself. I understand that the noble and learned Lord in charge of the Bill does not disapprove of it, and I hope your Lordships will find it in your power to sanction it.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 10, Sub-section 1, page 3, line 30, to leave out 'six' and to insert 'three.'"—(Lord de Ramsey.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: I wish to add another important sub-section to Clause 13. When the question of these accidents was before the Royal Commission their attention was called to the fact that there were certain railways in connection with factories and mines belonging to private owners which did not come under the Board of Trade or the Home Office. The Commission recommended that these lines should be brought in in some way, and my Amendment gives jurisdiction over them to the Home Office.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 13, page 4, line 41, to add as a new sub-section — '(3.) Where any line or siding is used in connection with a factory, workshop, or mine, and is neither part of the factory, workshop, or mine, nor a railway within the meaning of this Act, the occupier of the factory, workshop, or mine shall be under the same obligation to give notice of accidents occurring on the line or siding to persons employed in the factory, workshop, or mine as a railway company in the case of accidents occurring on a railway; but the notice shall be given to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State shall have the same powers and duties with respect to inquiries and investigations and the appointment of an assessor to the coroner as the Board of Trade has in similar cases.'"—(Lord James of Hereford.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD AVEBURY: My Lords, I beg to move an Amendment providing that new debentures or debenture stock issued may not be "in priority to" any existing debentures or debenture stock of the company. The Bill as it stands authorises the creation of a new charge in priority of the debentures which at present are by Statute a first charge on the companies concerned. The debenture-holders are not shareholders, but creditors. The majority of debenture stocks of our great English railways are stocks in which trustees are permitted to invest by Act of Parliament on the faith of their being, as they now are by law, a first charge upon the company, and it is now proposed for the first time to place another charge before them. I know it is argued that there is a precedent in an Act passed in 1889, but I venture to think that that Act is rather an example to be avoided than a precedent to be followed. It is not really a precedent. In that case the charge was created in the interest of the community as a whole; here it is for the benefit of a class—no doubt a very meritorious class, and for a very proper object; but still in the interest of a class. The acceptance of the Amendment would be no real hindrance to the carrying out of the provisions of the Bill, because if any company was unable to raise the money it would go into the hands of a receiver, who would then be able to rearrange the debt. I submit that to over-ride the present law and the rights of present debenture-holders and place new creditors in priority to those who have at present by Act of Parliament a first charge is a very dangerous precedent. It is true that this Amendment was rejected in the House of Commons, though brought forward by a Member of great weight and experience; but it came on late at night, and from what I have heard since, I have no doubt that under other circumstances it would have received the general support of Members with commercial experience. Second debentures are, as everyone knows, an inferior security. Millions of money—a large proportion in trust—have been invested in railway debenture stock on the faith of Parliamentary enactments that they are a first charge upon the undertakings. But if this Bill passes in its present form the existing debenture stocks will cease to be a first charge; they will sink to the position of second debentures. It is to maintain them in their present position, to uphold the character which Parliament has itself conferred on them, that I move to omit these words.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 14, page 5, line 8, to leave out 'in priority to or,' and to leave out 'pari passu with,' and to insert 'after.'"—(Lord Avebury.)

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: I mentioned in the Standing Committee the course which I thought it was right to take on this matter. The Government will not now adhere to the words "in priority to" for the reason that if we place all these debentures in priority to the other debentures we should place them in priority to the debentures of 1889. Therefore we will not maintain that position, but we must maintain the position that the debentures may be issued pari passu with any existing debentures or debenture stock of the company. I hope my noble friend and your Lordships will accept, if I may call it so, this compromise.

On Question, "That the words 'in priority to or' stand part of the clause," resolved in the negative.

LORD AVEBURY: After what the noble and learned Lord has said, I withdraw my Amendment to omit the words "pari passu with."

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Verbal Amendments agreed to.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, before the question is put "that the Bill do pass," I should like to say that when this question was before the Royal Commission, it was stated, probably correctly, that many accidents which occur to railway servants result from their own conduct—not necessarily from unmeritorious conduct, but from excess of zeal. This is not a matter that legislation can deal with, as to punish railway servants for desiring to fully perform their duty is repugnant to their employers and to public feeling. Therefore, nothing has been done in this Bill in reference to these accidents. It has been suggested, and I have done my best to see whether it can be carried into effect, that the best course would be to form a Conciliation Board, composed of three representatives of the railway companies, three representatives of the men, and one independent and impartial person, to formulate rules and to suggest methods by which these accidents can be mitigated. Such a Board would also be of great assistance to the Board of Trade if they made suggestions as to the best rules that could be made for carrying out the provisions of this measure and so preventing accidents. I hope this suggestion will be carried into effect. It will be a most valuable supplement to this Bill, and will be a great service to the railway servants of this country.

On Question, "That the Bill do pass," agreed to.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

THE SECRETARYSHIP OF THE MAYO COUNTY COUNCIL.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: My Lords, I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether they can state the reasons why the Local Government Board permitted Mr. Denis O'Connor Kelly to retain the office of secretary to the Mayo County Council after that gentleman refused to present himself for examination; and whether the Local Government Board will bear the extra expense caused by this permission being given by the Board. I should not trouble your Lordships with this question if I did not think it was one of great public importance. To explain my position I must refer to the question which I put on 26th June last to the noble Earl who represents the Irish Office in this House.* On that occasion I asked my noble friend whether, before ratifying the appointment, the Local Government Board had taken any steps to ascertain the fitness of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly, the late secretary to the Mayo County Council, for that post, to which he was appointed by the Council; and if not whether the expense caused by the condition of the accounts when Mr. Kelly resigned the office will be borne by the Local Government Board or the ratepayers. Owing, I have no doubt, to the omission on my part to put the question on the Paper, although I had already given private notice of it to the Irish Office, which I thought was quite sufficient, the noble Earl said he was unable to give me very much information. But he did give me this information. He said—

> "I can only say that the appointment of the late secretary was not ratified by the Local Government Board; on the contrary, the Department refused to ratify it because the late secretary declined to present himself for examination."

I would draw your Lordships' attention to the last words in that reply—namely, "the late secretary declined to present himself for examination." It was distinctly stated in the advertisement issued by the Local Government Board that no person was eligible to be appointed to the office of secretary of a county council in Ireland (1) unless he is over twenty-one years of age at the date of his appointment, and undertakes to devote his entire time to the duties of his office; (2) and unless he (a) is an existing secretary of a county council, or has acted for a period of three years as a duly authorised assistant to a secretary of a county council, and satisfies the Local Government Board that he has efficiently discharged the duties of his office; or (b) shall have been examined and his qualifications certified by some person or persons appointed for that purpose by the Local Government Board. The advertisement stated that the Local Government Board might, if they saw fit, dispense with the examination in the case of a candidate who could produce a certificate of having passed a public examination at least equivalent in the opinion of the Board to that which the Board required to be passed by secretaries of county councils, or could show that he possessed actuarial, legal, or other special qualifications for the office. Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly had not been secretary to any other county council, he had not acted as an assistant to a secretary to a county council, and he had not passed any examination; but notwithstanding this the Mayo County Council, in the exercise of their discretion, or their indiscretion, whichever you like to call it, appointed him to the office, and it then remained for the Local Government Board to call upon him to pass the examination. Although he refused to present himself for examination the Local Government Board allowed him to retain the position, and he acted as secretary to the county council for a period of more than six months. At the end of that time the condition of things was such that the Local Government Board addressed a letter to the county council, in which they stated that—

"The affairs of the Council have been allowed to lapse into a condition of almost hopeless confusion, and it will involve an expenditure of much time and labour to rectify the mistakes and supply the omissions of the past ten months."

I will quote to your Lordships a short extract from a letter which appeared in The Times on the subject on 16th February last, and which shows the condition into which things had been allowed to get. It is as follows—

"The secretary has neglected his business shamefully, no attempt has been made to keep the office accounts, the counter ledger has not been posted since the end of last September, and the first half-year's rate, which was agreed on by the Council on 19th May last, was not put in course of collection till October. No records exist in the office so show the total amounts collected on the several accounts for which the various collectors are responsible. The secretary of the council, whom the Board's letter describes as quite incompetent, and who has now resigned, is a brother of Mr. O'Connor Kelly, the chairman of the council."

Now comes the question on which I desire information. I want to know why the Local Government Board allowed Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly to hold office after he had refused to submit himself to an examination, and whether the £1,000 which had to be spent in putting the books and accounts in a proper condition will be borne by the ratepayers or the Local Government Board? I wish at once to say that I desire to throw no reflection whatever on the integrity of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly; it is purely a matter of incompetence. If the Local Government Board, when he refused to submit himself for examination, had insisted upon his resigning at once, this state of things could not possibly have happened. Therefore, it seems to me that the expense incurred was entirely due to the looseness with which the Local Government Board conducted their business. Under these circumstances it is extremely hard that the ratepayers should be made liable for this large expense.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: My Lords, I am able to give the noble Earl a rather fuller answer than I was able to give him when he asked this question on the last occasion. The Local Government Board for Ireland report that it is not the case that they permitted Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly to retain office after he refused to present himself for examination. On the contrary, they requested the county council to proceed at once to a fresh election. As no permission was given by the Board, as alleged, there was no expense caused by the supposed permission. It appears that during the interval between his nomination by the county council and his being called upon by the Local Government Board to undergo the necesssary examination, he was temporarily employed by the council to dispose of arrears of work left by his predecessor in office. The Local Government Board sent down two clerks in connection with these arrears. The other clerks were appointed by the county council, and the expense in connection with the employment of those clerks will be borne by the ratepayers. The Local Government Board did not at any time ratify or sanction the appointment of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly. On his being nominated by the county council the Board called upon him to undergo an examination, allowing him the usual six weeks to prepare for it. No extra expense was caused by this allowance of time. On the contrary, it was productive of some saving to the ratepayers, as the county surveyor, who acted as secretary during the interval, received an allowance of £3 3s. per week, whereas the secretary's salary would have been double. Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly refused to submit to an examination, and the Local Government Board directed the council to take steps to fill the vacancy.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: I cannot help expressing the opinion that ten months is a long time to elapse between the election of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly and the time at which he was compelled to resign.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: The people primarily to blame for the condition of affairs that existed, and the expense involved, are the Mayo County Council, who ought not to have appointed an incompetent person.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: But their appointment was only subject to the ratification of the Local Government Board.

VETERINARY SURGEONS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, a good deal has been done in recent years to improve the status and morale of the veterinary profession, and this Bill is intended to be a step in that direction. At this moment there are two corporations who grant diplomas to veterinary surgeons—the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons and the Highland Agricultural Society. The former has considerable disciplinary powers by which, in case of gross misconduct, they can withdraw their diploma from a veterinary surgeon. The Highland Agricultural Society do not possess such powers, and consequently, no matter how badly a man holding their diploma may behave, they cannot have it withdrawn. I will give your Lordships a single instance of what has taken place. A veterinary surgeon holding the Highland Agricultural Society's diploma insured a fictitious horse under a fictitious name, and then, in his own name, certified as to the soundness of the horse and afterwards certified as to its death. Then, in the fictitious name, he applied for the insurance money and got it. The insurance company, however, found him out, prosecuted him, and he was sentenced to three months imprisonment without the option of a fine. Notwithstanding this he is practising at this moment with the diploma of the Highland Agricultural Society. The object of this Bill is to give the latter society power to withdraw diplomas in such cases. The powers are carefully guarded, and the Bill has passed through the other House of Parliament.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—COMMAND OF THE ALLIED FORCES.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is proposed to put the allied forces at Tientsin under the command of a Japanese general officer; and who is in command of the allied forces at present, and who is it proposed to put in command when the advance on Peking commences.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am unable to make any statement on this subject at present.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to inform the House of Commons whether there is any Commander-in-Chief at the present moment in command of the allied forces at Tientsin?

[No answer was given.]

MR. DILLON: The House of Commons is being treated as it deserves.

COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a telegraphic despatch from the Government of China has been communicated within the last few days by the Chinese Ambassador to Her Majesty's Government; whether in that despatch the Chinese Government disowns all responsibility for the proceedings of the Boxers, and attributes a large share of the disasters which have occurred to the attack by the allied Admirals on the Ta-ku forts; and whether this despatch will be laid immediately upon the Table of the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: A despatch purporting to proceed from the Emperor of China was received yesterday. I am not at present able to say whether it will be possible to include it in the Papers to be presented to Parliament.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman refuse to inform the House of Commons whether a despatch from the Chinese Government has been received by Her Majesty's Government?

[No answer was given.]

MR. DILLON: I shall repeat the question on Monday.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Can the right. hon. Gentleman say whether the despatch has come through the usual official channels?

RECENT NEWS—THE SITUATION AT PEKING.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he is obliged to confirm the terrible news we have received from China?

*MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir; we have no confirmation of the news. The telegraph is not working between Shanghai and Cheefoo. We are unable, therefore, to obtain any information at present. The land telegraph lines have been cut, and we are unable to hold any communication with our own naval officers at present.

THE CAPTURE OF THE TA-KU FORTS.

MR. DILLON: In the vain hope of getting information I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to state to the House the grounds on which the allied Admirals justify their attack on the Ta-ku forts.

*MR. BRODRICK: The forts opened fire on the allied forces, but the operations of the Chinese in reinforcing Ta-ku, attacking Tong-ku, opposite Ta-ku, and mining the mouth of the Peiho would have made it necessary in any case to seize the forts before the relief of Tientsin could be attempted. Admiral Bruce stated that the capture of the forts had been effected only just in time. It was imperatively necessary to maintain communications with Tientsin and Admiral Seymour's force.

MR. DILLON: Is it not the fact that the forts opened fire only after notice had been served on them that the allied forces would take possession in the course of a few hours?

[No answer was given.]

EXPORTS OF WAR MATERIAL TO CHINA.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the exportation of arms to the Chinese by private firms has been stopped; and, if so, since what date.

*MR. BRODRICK: No general prohibition prohibiting the export of arms to China has been issued, but steps are being taken to watch the destination of any munitions of war sent to that country.

MR. DILLON: Then are we to understand that, in view of the position now prevailing, it is the case that British firms are at liberty to supply munitions of war to the Chinese?

[No reply was given.]

MR. DILLON: It is a monstrous outrage.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—KOORN SPRUIT DISASTER.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state on what grounds has the name of the officer responsible for the capture of the convoy and British guns at Koorn Spruit on 31st March been withheld from the public, despite repeated requests for its disclosure, when the names of officers, including the name of Sir Redvers Buller, who have been responsible for other mishaps to British troops, have been freely communicated.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have nothing to add to the answer which I have already given to the hon. Gentleman on this subject.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then I will ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is any distinction——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman has stated that he has nothing to add.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): May I ask whether it has occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that at least 100,000 men must be in possession of the information which is refused to the House of Commons?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should imagine that no one in South Africa is in possession of the information except the Commander-in-Chief and his immediate staff.

LINDLEY DISASTER—DESPATCHES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the despatches with reference to the disaster to the Imperial Yeomanry at Lindley have yet reached the War Office, or, if they have not arrived, at about what date may they be expected.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I am not prepared to answer questions as to the arrival or non-arrival of particular despatches. Except for telegraphic news, we have received no information as to any recent operations in South Africa.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is Lindley a recent operation, about which no despatch has been received?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Gentleman is endeavouring to elicit an answer which I have said I am not prepared to give. I am not prepared to discuss the arrival or non-arrival of despatches on particular operations.

DELAY IN NOTIFICATION OF SOLDIER'S DEATH.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can explain why the death of Private C. Barker, who died from enteric fever at Kloof Camp on 15th January, was not announced till 10th July, six months after his decease.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The information was furnished in a telegram from Cape Town dated the 9th instant. A telegram has been despatched to Cape Town questioning the accuracy of the date of death.

RELEASE OF BRITISH PRISONERS.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information to the effect that the 800 British prisoners of Yeomanry and Sherwood Foresters recently sent across the Natal Frontier were in a starving condition, and had been obliged to replace their own clothes by the cast-off garments of the Boers; and, if so, whether the Government have now in store in Natal ample supplies of warm and other clothing sufficiently to equip these returned prisoners.

*MR. WYNDHAM: We have no information beyond what has been stated in the press. There are ample stores in Natal to reclothe these men.

CHAPLAINS WITH THE TROOPS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table a statement of the number of chaplains attached to the forces in South Africa, specifying the religious denominations to which such chaplains belong.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The War Office has sent to South Africa, or given direct authority for employing, forty-nine Church of England chaplains, nine Church of Scotland and other Presbyterians, twenty-two Roman Catholics, and five Wesleyans. These are net figures, not including those who have died or been invalided. Besides these, the Commander-in-Chief in South Africa has had a free hand to employ colonial clergy, and large numbers of all denominations mentioned are known to have been employed, but no returns of their numbers or denominations have been sent to the War Office.

RETIRED ARMY MEDICAL OFFICERS RECALLED TO ACTIVE SERVICE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what is the number of the retired army medical officers who are liable to be recalled to service since the outbreak of hostilities in the Transvaal, and how many are now with the Field Forces in South Africa, or in hospitals at the bases.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There are ninety-eight retired Army medical officers liable to recall. Of these eighteen are holding permanent appointments reserved for officers on retired pay. The services of twenty-five others who volunteered to return to the service have been accepted, and they have been employed at home and abroad. None have been recalled by compulsion. Four officers are employed in South Africa and on hospital ships.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Out of ninety-eight officers on the retired list, only four are employed in South Africa?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir; but twenty-five others are employed elsewhere. The eighteen who are holding permanent appointments are officers of high rank, and it is thought better to employ in South Africa young civilian doctors who have more recent experience of hospital work.

MILITIA OFFICERS AND LINE COMMISSIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain why subaltern officers of Militia regiments, now attached to Line battalions in South Africa, performing the same duties as the regimental officers, and subject to the same risks of death or wounds in the field, or disease, are not, when occasions arise, given commissions in the Line, while captains and subalterns from Volunteer regiments, who have seen no service, are appointed to the vacant places; whether the War Office is averse to giving a commission to a man under twenty-one years of age; whether colonels in command have been privately cautioned not to recommend for commissions men under the age of twenty-one; and can he say why young men who have served in the campaign should be debarred, if otherwise deserving, on the ground of their youth, of preferment, having regard to the fact that they have been in charge of troops on the battlefield.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The commanding officer of every Militia battalion has been asked to recommend two of his officers for commissions in the Line, provided they are between the ages of twenty and thirty and unmarried; and in many cases officers attached to Line battalions in South Africa have been recommended and given commissions. Candidates for direct commissions, if taken below the age of twenty, would unfairly supersede the cadets at the Royal Military College and candidates who present themselves for the Militia examination. They would also be less fitted to stand hardships in the field than older men. Any Militia officer may be given a Line commission for distinguished service, irrespective of age.

EXAMINATION FOR COMMISSIONS.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether paragraph 6, Regulations for Commissions, provides that applications for competition must be forwarded by 15th July; whether it has been stated that certain modifications will be made; and whether, as it is now within three days of the date on which applications can be received, the War Office will consider the propriety of stating the precise nature of the alterations, the date of examination, and the number of commissions offered.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The notice will appear in the newspapers to-morrow morning. The period for making applications is extended to August 15th for candidates at home, and to September 15th for candidates abroad.

PATRIOTIC FUND—WIDOWS' ALLOWANCES.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Patriotic Commissioners have increased the grants given by them per week to widows not receiving assistance from what the Commissioners call overlapping funds, to an amount equal to that to which they have reduced the total allowance from all sources paid to widows receiving such assistance; and, if not, what steps (if any) the Government propose taking to prevent the Patriotic Commissioners from adding to their already large accumulations by this reduction of grants now given to widows receiving assistance from so-called overlapping funds.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand from the Patriotic Commissioners that no arrangements which they have made will lead to the accumulations of the funds which the hon. Gentleman fears.

AIRDRIE VOLUNTEERS—DISBANDMENT.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the General commanding the forces in Scotland reported adversely as to the reinstatement of the disbanded Airdrie Volunteers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member received an intimation in May that General Turner, the Inspector General of Auxiliary Forces, would be happy to discuss this question with him if he would call. I submit that that is the best course for him to follow. In reply to a further question by Mr. Wilson, Mr. Wyndham said the last official report was dated two years since. The hon. Member had better discuss the matter with the proper military authorities.

MR. JOHN WILSON: Will you show me the Report?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I will consider that, but the hon. Member had far better pursue the proper course in the matter, and consult the Inspector General of Auxiliary Forces.

PRISON OFFICIALS VOLUNTEERS—CAMP LEAVE.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any arrangements have been made by which warders and assistant warders in Her Majesty's prisons who are volunteers will be granted special leave to attend camp; and if so, whether he will state what the arrangements are.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): No special arrangements have been made, but applications are dealt with as received under the Treasury Circular of the 10th of May, and every facility is given consistently with the needs of the service.

UNDER AGE RECRUITS—CASE OF MICHAEL FARRELL.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will inquire if Michael Farrell, of Scariff, when under age, recently enlisted in the 2nd Battalion Royal Irish Fusiliers, now serving in England, and that his discharge has been claimed by his father; and whether he will order his discharge.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The widowed mother of this soldier has asked for his discharge, and has asserted that the written consent to his enlistment which stands under her name was not really given by her. The facts are being investigated, and if Mrs. Farrell's assertions are correct her request will be granted.

MILITIA OFFICERS AND POLITICS—POSITION OF M.P.'S AND CANDIDATES IN THE MILITIA.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the Queen's regulation forbidding officers on full pay attending political meetings applies to Militia officers who are Members of Parliament or candidates; and, if so, if the regulation would be temporarily suspended in case of a General Election, or would candidates be seconded.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Queen's Regulations apply to officers of embodied Militia; the question of providing for the case of Members of Parliament and Parliamentary candidates will be considered.

ROYAL RESERVE REGIMENTS—OFFICERS.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how far the War Department has been successful in providing officers for the Royal Reserve battalions and cavalry regiments, and what is now the average number of officers per 1,000 men in the Royal Reserves.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The number of officers is still insufficient. The proportion at present is twenty-four per thousand men in the cavalry and fourteen in the infantry.

VOLUNTEERS AND ACTIVE SERVICE—THE NEW GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS.

MR. WARNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the draft order issued by the War Office early this week, inviting Volunteers to undertake the liability of being called out for actual military service or service abroad, can be carried out before the Bill to amend the Volunteer Act now down for Second Reading has been passed and received the Royal Assent; and if the action of the War Office in issuing this order is sanctioned by the Secretary of State for War.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir; the Paper referred to was laid in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of judging the scope of the Government proposals before they come up for discussion.

3RD BATTALION GORDON HIGHLANDERS—RECENT INSPECTION.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is aware that, at the recent inspection of the 3rd Battalion Gordon Highlanders at Edinburgh by the General commanding the forces in Scotland, two hours were spent in endeavouring to get their toes into line and their thumbs straight; and if, after our experience in South Africa, he will direct that less time be given to such details, and more to such essential training as fire discipline, taking cover, and other exercises.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Nothing is known of the alleged incident, and the Secretary of State for War does not propose to interfere with the discretion of the General Officer commanding the Scottish District.

VOLUNTEER COMMANDING OFFICERS AND ARMY CONTRACTORS.

Mr. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War what action it is intended to take in view of the direct encouragement to fraud embodied in the openly expressed intention of certain officers commanding regiments of reserve forces to expend public funds upon purchases from persons whose names have been officially notified as having been struck off the War Office list for supplying defective goods for the use of Her Majesty's troops.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In cases where there has clearly been fraud or serious misconduct on the part of the contractors, the Secretary of State is prepared to order the commanding officers of Volunteer corps to cease dealing with persons whose names have been struck off the War Office list. He hopes, however, that, without any instruction on his part, Volunteer commanding officers will avoid dealing with all such persons.

1ST VOLUNTEER BATTALION ROYAL WELSH FUSILIERS.

MR. HOWELL (Denbigh Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the 1st Volunteer Battalion Royal Welsh Fusiliers, which is going into camp on Saturday next 1,070 men strong, is only in possession of 670 rifles; and whether he can state when the battalion will receive its proper number of rifles.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The 369 rifles demanded will be issued as soon as possible, but the demand for 276 of these was only received at Weedon on the 9th instant. An explanation will be called for from the Volunteer battalion.

WELSH FUSILIERS VOLUNTEER BATTALION OFFICERS AND THE "FLASH."

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the officers of the Volunteer battalions of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers are entitled to wear the "flash," which is part of the uniform of the Regular and Militia battalions of this regiment.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Permission to officers of the Volunteer battalions Royal Welsh Fusiliers to wear the "flash" was granted on the 7th instant, and has been duly notified to the district.

MILITARY LANDS IN COUNTY DOWN.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that the Belfast Water Commissioners object to the War Office taking up for military purposes that portion of the Mourne District, in county Down, which forms the catchment area of the Belfast waterworks, upon which about a million pounds have been expended in the interest of the health of the citizens of Belfast; and will the War Office scheme be persisted in, in the face of this complaint, while plenty of ground is available in other districts where no such objection exists.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It is not believed that the use of the land authorised by the Bill could affect injuriously the Belfast water supply. Every endeavour will, however, be made to meet the wishes of the Commissioners.

SUGAR BOUNTIES ABOLITION—NEGOTIATIONS WITH FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether there are any negotiations proceeding with reference to the abolition of the sugar bounties, either on the part of Her Majesty's Government with foreign Powers or among such Powers themselves.

*MR. BRODRICK: No negotiations on the subject are now proceeding on the part of Her Majesty's Government, but there is reason to believe that certain communications have recently passed between some foreign Governments relative to the abolition of sugar bounties. Her Majesty's Government have not yet learnt whether those communications are likely to lead to any practical result.

PALMISTS AND FORTUNE TELLERS IN WEST LONDON.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the advertisements of palmists, fortune tellers, and other necromancers who now ply their trade in the West End of London; and whether, seeing that poor gipsies who practise the same calling are prosecuted and punished for obtaining money by false pretences, the Public Prosecutor intends to take a similar action against these fashionable soothsayers.

MR. MORE (Shropshire, Ludlow): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, before that question is answered, whether he is aware that in a case tried before Mr. Fenwick at Bow Street it was stated that there were twenty letters produced from ladies who said that they had consulted these parties against the wishes of their husbands, and that——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, Order!

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: In my view the important question to consider in determining whether or not it is desirable to prosecute such persons under the Vagrant Act, is whether or not the practice is followed with a view to fraud or other unlawful purpose. Acting on this principle the police have recently prosecuted to conviction a well-known West End palmist, and the conviction has just been upheld on appeal.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Is it a fact, may I ask, that these parties were visited by bishops?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: All the more reason why they should be prosecuted.

PAY OF THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Corporation of the City of London have recently instructed the Police Committee to consider and report as to the advisability of increasing the pay of the City Police Force; and whether he will consider the advisability of increasing the pay of the Metropolitan Police Force.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The answer is in the negative.

BOARD OF TRADE ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON LIGHTHOUSE WORKS, ETC.

MR. NICOL (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will print and publish the Report presented to him by the Advisory Committee on new Lighthouse Works, etc., after their meeting with the representatives of the three Lighthouse Boards at the Board of Trade.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): No, Sir. I do not propose to publish the letter referred to by my hon. friend. The negotiations with the Advisory Committee are far more likely to have the useful effect which I hope will result from them if the communications are treated as confidential.

LIGHTHOUSE COMMUNICATION—WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether experiments in wireless telegraphy conducted with an apparatus on the East Goodwin light-vessel were successful, and whether the apparatus has since been removed and nothing further done.

MR. RITCHIE: I understand that the experiment of establishing electrical communication with the East Goodwin light vessel was regarded as successful. The experiment having been completed the apparatus was removed, and the whole question of electrical communication with light stations has, as I stated in my reply to a question addressed to me on the 10th instant by the hon. Member for Cambridge, been referred to an Inter-departmental Committee.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the distance of the Borkum light-vessel from the receiving office in Germany, and what was the distance of the East Goodwin light-vessel from the receiving office in England; and whether, seeing that wireless telegraphic communication is now conducted between the Borkum light-vessel and the German shore, while no such communication exists between the East Goodwin light-vessel and the English shore, he will explain why arrangements for communication between a lightship and the shore can be made in Germany and not made in England.

MR. RITCHIE: I am not aware of the name of the receiving office in Germany with which the Borkum light-vessel is in communication, and I am, therefore, unable to state the distance between the office and the vessel. The distance between the East Goodwin light-vessel and the receiving office in England was about ten miles. The mere practicability of establishing communication is, as my hon. friend will understand, not the only question to be considered. Very difficult questions of patent rights are involved, and the question how to deal with those rights needs careful handling.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Is the right hon. Gentleman taking steps to expedite the settlement?

MR. RITCHIE: I have communicated to the Inter-departmental Committee expressing the hope that they may speedily make their Report.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Who are the members of the Committee?

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot remember the names, but the Post Office, the Treasury, the Admiralty, and the Board of Trade are all represented.

OPHTHALMIC CASES IN METROPOLITAN POOR LAW SCHOOLS.

MR. FLOWER (Bradford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state the number of ophthalmic cases in the metropolitan poor-law schools, infirmaries, and workhouses, including those under the Metropolitan Asylums Board, on 1st July of this year.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I cannot give the information asked for as regards the 1st July, nor have the Local Government Board any recent Return as to the number of cases in workhouses and infirmaries. I may, however, state that on the 16th June last the number of these cases in metropolitan poor-law schools and under the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District appears to have been 304.

MR. FLOWER: Is it not the fact that the Returns are made twice yearly—in July and December?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Not for workhouses.

SUTTON SCHOOLS—PROVISION FOR POOR LAW CHILDREN.

MR. FLOWER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state what proposals of boards of guardians for disposing of the children on the dissolution of the Sutton Schools he has sanctioned, and is willing to sanction.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Camberwell guardians are proposing to provide for the children belonging to their parish by the provision of scattered homes. The Local Government Board have approved of the hiring of twenty-two houses by them for this purpose, and of the purchase of a site for central headquarters. The Board have authorised the guardians of the four other poor-law unions in the district to acquire sites for the erection of schools, either on the cottage home system, or partly in cottage homes and partly in blocks, to accommodate not more than sixty children each.

CARMARTHEN PRISON — MISS BRYANT'S SUPERANNUATION.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the case of Miss E. Bryant, acting matron at Her Majesty's Prison, Carmarthen, from 1877 to 1898; whether he is aware that in 1898 the justices of the peace for the county of Carmarthen granted her a superannuation allowance of £27 5s. 10d. per annum, and that the Carmarthenshire County Council, after obtaining the sanction of the Home Secretary, paid her the sum of £21 0s. 7d. in December, 1898, while in June, 1899, the Local Government Board auditor disallowed £19 11s. 9d. of the sum of £21 0s. 7d., and surcharged the chairman of the Finance Committee with the same; whether he is aware that in November, 1899, the chairman of the Finance Committee appealed to the Local Government Board against the disallowance, and can he state whether the question has yet been decided, and, if so, the decision arrived at; whether any, and, if so, what communication has passed between the Local Government Board and the Home Office in reference to the above matter; and whether, as owing to the dispute in question Miss Bryant is still unpaid, he will expedite the matter so as to enable the county council to pay the amount due to her.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The Local Government Board have received an appeal against the disallowance referred to, but the appeal has not yet been decided. Legal questions of difficulty are involved in the case, and correspondence has taken place between the Board, the Home Office, and the Treasury with regard to it. The Board are now awaiting a communication from the Treasury on the subject, on the receipt of which they hope to be able to dispose of the appeal.

BRITISH EXPORTS OF WAR MATERIAL.

*Sir J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Customs Department notifies to the Admiralty and War Office respectively full particulars as to exportation of arms, ammunition, and warlike stores to foreign States and territories; and, if so, whether such notification is given by that Department to the Admiralty and War Office respectively at stated periods, or immediately the Board of Trade officials become aware of such shipments having been made; and, if at stated periods, whether monthly, quarterly, or otherwise.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. Hanbury, Preston): Detailed Returns of war material and naval stores shipped at ports in the United Kingdom have been furnished by the Customs to the Admiralty at their request since June, 1889. These Returns are supplied as soon as practicable after shipment. Returns are not usually supplied to the War Office, which receives a quarterly statement from the Admiralty; but since the outbreak of the war the Director of Military Intelligence has been supplied, at his request, with Returns for South African ports.

HIGH WYCOMBE POST OFFICE.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will state the date of his decision that Flint House shall be used as the post office for High Wycombe; whether he is aware that nine-tenths of the adult inhabitants of the town protested against the course he is adopting, and that in one year the new post office could be constructed on the site approved by the postal authorities and by the municipal and other representative authorities of the town; and whether he has any objection to place the correspondence upon the Table, and give the House an opportunity of altering the decision of his permanent officials.

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has never altered the original decision that Flint House shall be used for the new post office at High Wycombe. He has received several deputations and representations both for and against the new street scheme, and he is aware that local feeling is much divided on the subject; but he is not aware that nine-tenths of the adult inhabitants of the town have protested against the course that is being adopted. A new post office could not be commenced until after the new street was completed, and then could not be finished in a year. The Postmaster General sees no sufficient reason for laying the correspondence on the Table.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: Has not a petition signed by nine-tenths of the inhabitants been received?

Mr. HANBURY: I cannot admit that any such petition has been received.

BLETCHLEY POSTMAN'S STRIPES.

Mr. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, on what grounds two stripes are withheld from postman White, of Bletchley, and for what reason the application he has sent in for his record has been refused.

Mr. HANBURY: White was deprived of his two good conduct stripes in January, 1898, for absenting himself from duty on an insufficient plea of illness, a form of irregularity of which he had frequently been guilty. The postman was informed of the cause of this punishment, and as the only reason he gave for asking for a copy of his record was to prove that he was "punished for illness in 1898," it was not considered necessary to comply with his request.

NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY—ROYALTIES.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, what is the amount paid by the National Telephone Company as royalty on their gross receipts last year, and where is this sum to be found set forth in the public accounts.

MR. HANBURY: The amount paid by the National Telephone Company to the Post Office as royalty for the year ended the 31st March, 1900, is £134,115, and this amount will be included in the Finance Accounts (page 23) under the heading "Telegraph Service, Gross Receipts."

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Is it possible to recognise the item?

MR. HANBURY: Yes; it is clear on page 23.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Does the Government propose to conduct opposition to the company in order to extinguish this receipt?

MR. HANBURY: Her Majesty's Government are acting in accordance with the wishes of Parliament, which has decided that there shall be competition.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT CULLYHANNA, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, seeing that the postal arrangements of Cullyhanna, county Armagh, have been admitted by the postal authorities to be defective, he will explain why the mail comes by car from Monaghan, a distance of thirty miles, although there is a railway station within seven miles of Cullyhanna, and the district of Crossmaglen is already served by day mail from this station, and its letters delivered every morning at 8.45 a.m., while letters in the same train for Cullyhanna are not delivered till the following day, being kept all night at Newtown Hamilton; will he explain why in the arrangements now being made to combine the service of the day and night mails in the Crossmaglen district and deliver them together, Cullyhanna is being excluded, although the new arrangements will operate within a mile of its boundary; and whether he can see his way to include Cullyhanna in the same district as Crossmaglen, and thus effect a considerable saving of expense in a combined delivery.

MR. HANBURY: Arrangements have not been made for a combined night and day mail service in the Crossmaglen district. At Crossmaglen itself there are two deliveries in the morning. The expense of affording a combined night and day mail delivery at Cullyhanna from Crossmaglen, as suggested by the hon. Member, would be considerable, and a later delivery would be involved in waiting for the day mail letters. The Postmaster General regrets that in the circumstances he would not be justified in authorising such an alteration.

IRISH TRAVELLING POST OFFICES—LAVATORY ACCOMMODATION.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the recommendations of the Tweedmouth Committee regarding lavatory accommodation on travelling post offices have not yet been made effective in Ireland, and that at present there are no lavatories attached to Irish travelling post offices; and whether, pending the carrying out of the Tweedmouth recommendation, any provisional arrangements in this matter could be made, and could he state definitely when the recommendation would become operative.

MR. HANBURY: As stated in answer to a similar question put by the hon. Member for Kilkenny on the 18th May last, lavatory accommodation is being provided in certain new mail carriages now being constructed in Ireland, but it is proposed not to provide it in the carriages at present in use until it is seen whether the accommodation is appreciated by the sorters in the new carriages. In a number of cases in which such accommodation has been afforded in England, the men, although they asked for it in the first instance, have, after experience, applied that it might be withdrawn.

COOTEHILL (CAVAN) POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, with reference to the recent appointment of postmaster of Cootehill, county Cavan, would he state to the House what are the precise qualifications and experience of the new postmaster; whether he is aware that for nearly fifty years the office has been managed by women, and can he say whether any complaint of inefficiency was made during that time; whether one of the female applicants for the post holds the Civil Service certificate, has had eleven years experience, and has had entire temporary charge of local offices; and can he state on what grounds a trader, untrained and inexperienced in postal affairs, has been appointed in preference to certificated female officials of eleven years experience.

MR. HANBURY: As explained already, it was considered desirable that this sub-office should be placed in the hands of a man, and it was for this reason that a woman was not appointed. The person selected is reported to possess the necessary capacity for the post, but the essential qualification in this case is that he is a man.

IRISH RURAL AUXILIARIES AND THE TWEEDMOUTH REPORT.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the Tweedmouth Committee recommended any concessions, such as increase of wages, annual leave, Sunday and sick leave pay, uniform and overcoat and boot allowance, to Irish rural auxiliary postmen performing four hours duty daily; and will their case be favourably considered.

MR. HANBURY: No, Sir; Irish rural auxiliary postmen were not specially referred to by the Committee. These men do, however, share the privileges accorded to auxiliary postmen generally; and the Postmaster General is not aware of any reason for making exceptional arrangements in their favour. If the hon. Member can show me any cases in which they are not treated alike, I shall be glad to see into them.

MALLOW RURAL DISTRICT—ROAD REPAIR.

MR WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at the last meeting of the Cork County Council, the Law Adviser informed the council that no moneys could be spent on the maintenance of certain roads in Mallow Rural District, until the district council formulated a proposal which should be approved at the next quarterly meeting of the county council in October, the result of which would be that these roads would be left derelict for over three months, and become both a danger and a nuisance; and will the Local Government Board, in view of these circumstances, consider the necessity of issuing an order to hand over the charge of the roads to the county surveyor, pending the formulation of a proposal and its acceptance by the county council?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): As regards the first paragraph, I stated yesterday that I understood the failure in this case arose from the fact that a sufficient number of members to constitute a quorum was not present at the meeting of the county council on the 17th May, which meeting had been duly appointed for the consideration of tenders for the maintenance of the roads in question. The Local Government Board are advised that they have no power to issue an Order as suggested in the second paragraph.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there can be no meeting of the county council before October? Will it not be a serious state of things for these roads to be left unrepaired till then? Cannot the Local Government Board act now as they did on a former occasion?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I will make further inquiries; but I think there must be some mistake on the part of the hon. Member. I am instructed we have no power to issue such an Order.

MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: Well, I will furnish the right hon. Gentleman with a copy of the Order made by the Local Government Board.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to state when the Indian Budget will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will not be possible to take it next week, as all the days are allocated, but I hope to take it the week after.

GENERAL RUSSELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is proposed to take the Military Manœuvres Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member the information he asks for.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Vote for the Colonial Office will be taken, and whether it can be taken next Friday.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already allocated next Friday to Irish Estimates, and I am not prepared to make any statement as to subsequent days.

MR. CHANNING: Why not the following Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot make any statement at present.

CIVIL SERVICE AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES, 1900–1901.

CLASS II.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £96,407, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department and Subordinate Offices."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): There has been some opportunity this session of considering labour matters in connection with the agricultural labouring class with fruitful results, and questions interesting also to miners have been discussed; but with regard to town labour little has been said, and subjects which are annually discussed by trades union representatives at their annual conferences have had little attention at the hands of Parliament; indeed, this Vote affords the only opportunity of raising them. I wish to begin my remarks by thanking the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary for having met us on one point which we put forward in the debate last year. On that occasion we moved the reduction of the Vote and carried it to a division, mainly on the ground of the extraordinary and increasing delay in the presentation to Parliament of the Annual Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops, and of the accompanying documents which make it so important to the labour world. The right hon. Gentleman did not see his way to meet us on that occasion, but a month later, at the extreme end of the session, he came forward and voluntarily stated that he could procure a much earlier presentation to Parliament of the Report. He has kept his word, and so far as it was dependent upon him, I believe he more than kept his word, for while last year's Report was only circulated in February last, he promised that the Report should be presented this year as early as May, and he actually sent it to the printers in April; it was only delay in the correction of proofs, and in the printing office, for which he is in no way responsible, which caused circulation of the Report to be delayed until July. However, for what he has done we thank him, and therefore, in dealing with this matter to-night, I have to begin my speech by saying that, as regards the principal question we raised last year, we have been met and satisfied. I come to the Report which has just been laid before Parliament. In perusing it there appear to me to be several subjects which I cannot refrain from examining with some intention of censure. There are three matters with which I think it necessary to deal on this occasion. As to one of them I have little to say. Another relates to the question of phosphorus poisoning, which we have already discussed this session, with Mr. Speaker in the Chair. That discussion took place under limitations which resulted in certain matters being reserved for debate to-night. It also occurred at one o'clock in the morning, and, of course, at a time when we had not this Report. Still, as a report of the debate appears in Hansard,* I shall only deal with it briefly. The only matter on which I deem it necessary to detain the Committee is the question of lead poisoning in china and earthenware manufacture. The Home Office have shown that it undoubtedly believes there has been an enormous improvement produced by its work in this direction ; but I cannot admit the improvement, and can find little confirmation of it in the Report which has been laid before us. This is a matter which deserves most careful attention at the hands of this Committee to-night. On the 18th January last there was an interesting speech made by Mr. Rawdon Smith, who is in the confidence of the china manufacturers of this country. As an expert and a specialist he made a speech at the annual dinner of those manufacturers, and when I read some extracts I have made from that speech I think the Committee will agree as to the necessity of carefully watching what is done in this matter. When, for instance, we find such boasts made as that the china manufacturers of this country have broken down the efforts of the Home Office—efforts which we thought had been successfully made—it certainly does seem necessary that we should closely scrutinise what has occurred. At this dinner Mr. Rawdon Smith boasted that the four conditions which the Government wished to impose "were now gone."

> "Lead [he said] could now be used, and it was not intended to restrict it to 10 per cent. Instead of prohibiting the use of raw lead, manufacturers might now use a preparation of lead as soluble as raw. . . . . There was no reason why they should not have the age lowered from fifteen to fourteen for dipping-house lads."

The Committee will have to consider from the figures which have been placed before it whether it is true, as Mr. Rawdon Smith said, that the reason for retaining the higher age has gone, and I have no doubt that upon that point the Home Secretary will be able to agree with us that there is no reason whatever for lowering the age. Then Mr. Rawdon Smith went on to say that "by combination they had obtained almost everything"; and he added, I am sorry to say, "Every credit should be given to Mr. Walmsley" (Her Majesty's Inspector in the Potteries District.) When we discussed this question previously my hon. friend the Member for Battersea, alluding to that gentleman, suggested that, in view of the strong opinions he held, and of the attitude which he had taken up, it would be an advantage if he were promoted to another district, and it was partly in consequence of what we knew of him that we pressed so strongly for the appointment of a woman inspector in that district. Well, Mr. Rawdon Smith says of him that—> "He gave judicious advice to the Department. . . . He [Mr. Smith] believed that the potting industry now stood well with the Home Office."

Of course, we all wish for every industry to stand well with the Home Office, but, certainly, in regard to this china industry, the speech from which I have quoted makes it all the more necessary that we should carefully scrutinise what has been and is being done. What are the figures as to this extraordinary improvement which we are told has taken place? Immediately after the speech of Mr. Rawdon Smith in January a series of prosecutions took place which were mentioned in this House by my hon. friend the Member for Berwickshire. They were prosecutions of leading firms, and they showed that even among the leading firms in the Potteries the special rules were not carefully observed. That is another matter deserving the attention of the Committee. Early this session the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, who represents a most important district in the Potteries, and who speaks with special knowledge of the views and feelings of the trade, put some questions which, I think, were intended to show that a great improvement had been effected. In answering those questions the Home Secretary adopted that view, and congratulated the country on the immense improvement which had taken place. He spoke of it as a steady improvement, and we who have been pressing for certain things to be done, and for the special rules to be enforced, of course, naturally hoped for and expected such an improvement. As regards the dry processes the use of fan ventilators no doubt has been productive of improvement, but I must point out that the figures quoted by the right hon. Gentleman in one of his replies, figures referring to the period since March, are, of course, vitiated by the great lock-out which occurred in March, April, and May. Many thousands of workpeople were affected by that lock-out, and therefore, in estimating the value of the figures, this consideration must be borne in mind. Now, figures which some of us have had means of obtaining privately have led us to doubt the steadiness of the improvement of which the Home Secretary spoke. We have certain means of obtaining figures from medical gentlemen in the Potteries through the Lead Fund, and these figures appear to be of a very alarming nature when they are looked into. I have no desire to horrify this House by making highly-coloured statements. I propose to give the bare statement of facts, and I think that will be sufficient to bring home to the minds of the members of this Committee the serious nature of the matters with which we are dealing. I have some figures which have been supplied by Dr. Prendergast as to cases which came under his notice between 27th July, 1898, and 8th April, in the present year. He had to deal with 290 cases of lead poisoning in that period, and more than half of them were the cases of women. Of these seven were mad, twelve totally blind, forty-six partially blind, and the rest were mostly paralysed. I merely mention these figures in order to show the grave character of this question.

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): Are these official figures?

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: No. They are obtained from private sources—from medical officers of the Lead Fund. I am coming to the official figures presently. I am now merely pointing out the reason why I had grave doubts as to the reality of the steady improvement.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): The figures are from Dr. Prendergast, who, I have no doubt, will be willing to show his clinical note-book to anyone who desires to see it.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: Besides the alarming number and character of these cases Dr. Prendergast points out the terrible destruction of infant life, for, in that same period, he recorded the deaths of twenty-four children of lead workers from convulsions, all these children being under one year of age. Next I come to the official figures. I quite recognise the right of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent to question any private figures, and I merely used these to show the reasons which weigh with some of us and cause us to view the official document with some jealousy. The tables for the past year will be found on page 375 of the Annual Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops. They show in 1896, 1897, and 1898, not a steady diminution but a steady increase. We must take it as admitted that, in spite of the new rules which we are told have produced an immense improvement, in spite of the precautions which have been taken, there has been a steady increase in these three years; 1899 is said to be much better. I have examined the figures for that year—they will be found on page 311 of the Report—and I admit that, at first sight, they do seem to be much better. But the inspectors themselves point out that eleven cases had to be added in connection with litho-transfer works, which were not included on account of a change in the form of the tables, and there is also a note on pages 300–301 of the exclusion of another eleven cases in 1899, which were separate cases of second notifications affecting the same person. On page 312 is noted a new practice in regard to suspension. Before 1899 suspensions did not exist, but now it is the practice of the certifying surgeon to suspend from work an enormous number of persons who are suspected to be suffering from lead poisoning. In view of this practice it is very difficult indeed to deal with the figures for 1899, but I would suggest that the great majority of persons suspended from work must be taken to be persons who have already developed a mild form of lead poisoning. I put a question some time ago with a view to trying to distinguish between the dry and damp processes, and the Home Secretary has been good enough to issue a Return on the subject. It is undoubtedly the damp process which is most productive of disease. In the dry process great improvement has been brought about by the introduction of fan ventilation. But in the other process it is the touching of a damp material which easily leads to lead poisoning. It is, however, almost impossible to carefully distinguish between the two processes as there are a large number of intermediate processes. It will be remembered that in the discussion which took place earlier in the session on the match industry it transpired that matches were sometimes boxed dry and sometimes damp, and the same commingling of processes takes place in the potting trade. The Return which the right hon. Gentleman has been good enough to give shows the number of cases of lead poisoning in the first five months of the present year. These figures are, of course, affected by the lock-out, and they would undoubtedly have been worse but for that lock-out. I do not think they can be said to show improvement; on the contrary, they show deterioration in the present year, as compared with 1899, especially in the case of women. The column referring to the china trade gives nine cases of females in the first five months of this year, as against eight cases in the whole of last year. The figures for the earthenware industry show the cases of thirty-nine women in the first five months of this year, as against eighty-three for last year. The Committee will see, therefore, that the figures are absolutely worse in the first instance, and relatively so in the second. The question of suspensions is dealt with on the last page of the Return, and I find that one hundred and three females were suspended last year, and forty-two in the first five months of the present year. More than half of these cases are cases of permanent and not of temporary suspension. The Committee will agree that these figures are grave, and that they hardly bear out the view that that steady improvement has taken place which we anticipated, and which in fact we are told has taken place. In letters which I have received on the subject one point has been raised which I should like to mention, although I do not wish to lay too much stress upon it. Persons who have watched these matters have reason to think that the apparently philanthropic practice adopted by some factory owners of appointing their own medical officer to attend their work people gratuitously has led to a certain amount of non-reporting, and that the number of cases is larger than has been actually reported. Manufacturers are more and more adopting this apparently philanthropic practice. Of course, the doctor so appointed does not supersede the certifying surgeon, but the latter not unnaturally may feel some delicacy in examining into a case which has already been seen and reported upon by another practitioner. However that may be in regard to non-reporting, the figures I have given are far from satisfactory. I cannot myself admit suspension from work as being a permanent remedy. It is a temporary remedy in its nature; it means, after all, in most cases after paralysis, loss of work, and dependence on charity throughout the remainder of life. That is not the remedy that we ought to look to; we must look to the causes of the sickness which can be prevented. I have always thought—and I have said it previously in this House—that, from the evidence which I have studied, it was possible to abolish the use of raw lead altogether. If it be not abolished, at least the employment of young persons in raw lead proceses might be prevented. The Home Office has not, up to the present time, followed the advice of its own experts in regard to fixing the standard of frits, or in excluding children, young persons and women from working in raw lead. There is a great contrast between the circular of December last contained in the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops and the language used by the Home Office expert himself, Dr. Thorpe, in a lecture delivered by him at the Royal Institution on 4th May this year. At page 13 of the Chief Inspector's Report is found the circular which gives a fresh period of delay as regards the ability to use raw lead; it postpones the adoption of a standard of safety in frits for two years; it permanently allows the use of raw lead in small quantities, and there is no restriction of the labour of women and young persons, as recommended by Drs. Thorpe and Oliver. At page 14 of the Chief Inspector's Report it is stated—and the statement follows those in the circular—that "rules are being drafted to carry out the views expressed above." The statement is very general and vague, and I do not know what it means. I wish to press the Home Secretary on this point. I want to know specifically if these rules which are being drafted are merely rules on frits and glazes, or whether they are more general; and when they may be expected to be issued and become operative. I venture to contrast the Home Office statement with that of Dr. Thorpe, whom they themselves called in a few years ago. Dr. Thorpe, who is the director of the Government laboratory where all these tests are made, used language which is strong though guarded, and I should like to quote to the House a few words from a report of his lecture. I have two verbatim reports of that lecture—one which appeared in the Staffordshire Sentinel the day after it was delivered, and the other since published by the Royal Institution, which is apparently a revised report. In order to be perfectly fair to the Committee, I may mention that there is a slight difference between the two reports, due mostly to literary corrections in the revised one. Dr. Thorpe says—

"A number of manufacturers . . . are now producing lead frits, the solubility of which is even below the standard provisionally suggested in the Home Office circular of December."

And then he goes on to say—

"It must be clearly understood that complete immunity from lead poisoning can never be obtained so long as lead compounds continue to be used. The true solution is to be found in the more general adoption of leadless glazes. Leadless glazes of a high brilliancy and durability are perfectly practicable."

The revised report says—

"Leadless glazes of a sufficient brilliancy and durability and adapted to all kinds of ware are now within reach of the manufacturer."

Dr. Thorpe concludes by saying—

"There is no industry in the world so conservative as that of the potter."

He praises the great Wedgwood, who took advantage of all the discoveries of science in his time, and he contrasts his conduct with that of the potters of the present day, and he evidently thinks that if the latter followed Wedgwood's example, the result would be infinitely more to their advantage and the safety of their workmen. I think I have established the fact that the steady improvement that we were led to expect had already taken place is not to be found in the official figures themselves, and the House has some reason to press the Home Office not to depart from their good intentions of a year ago, as they seem to me to have departed, by weakening the circular, but to come up to the standard of their own experts, Drs. Thorpe and Oliver. Perhaps I shall not carry all my friends with me, but, personally, I believe that additional security would be gained for immunity from or diminution of suffering by the adoption of the proposal we made two years ago for the appointment of a permanent woman inspector for Staffordshire. I doubt whether the present inspectors are sufficient in number, and whether a flying visit of an inspector from London is sufficient to check the existing evils. The vast majority of the persons employed in the potteries are women, and we know that women are averse to speaking freely to male inspectors, who, even if sincerely desirous of enforcing the law, cannot get at the facts. It is on that matter that I shall move the reduction of the Vote of which I have given notice. There are other matters regarding phosphorus poisoning and the match trade which I wish to bring before the House before I sit down. At page 375 of the Chief Inspector's Report, and at page ix. of the Introduction to that Report, it is stated that there are "fewer instances of phosphorus necrosis reported in 1899 as compared with 1898." The Committee will remember that the cases in 1898 were unduly swelled by the extraordinary increase caused by the discovery of the previously neglected cases from Bryant and May's, and no comparison is therefore possible. As regards the new rules the Home Office, of course, make the admission in the Report that they are less stringent than had been proposed, but they claim that they are still far in advance of those previously in force. That I doubt. I may say in general terms that the new rules were framed on a low standard as compared with the suggestions of Drs. Thorpe, Oliver, and Cunningham in their special report to the Home Office. Just as I have complained in the case of lead poisoning, the Home Office have not come up to the requirements of their experts, even before the new rules were cut down. At page ix. of the Introduction to their Report we have the recommendations of the three doctors I have named, but few of these recommendations were adopted by the Home Office in the new rules. As an example of a rule recommended and not adopted I may quote the exclusion of children and young persons from the dangerous branches of the trade.

The Report of the Chief Inspector at pages 52-6 gives the rules both as the Home Office proposed them, and as they were issued after arbitration, and members of the Committee can compare them for themselves and judge. A power was inserted by the arbitrator—who, it must be remembered, was the Home Office arbitrator, sitting without the manufacturers' arbitrator—to suspend the rules, and the effect of that in the case of individual manufacturers is to enable employers to work under different rules, which is the very point to which the Home Secretary himself has most strongly objected. At page viii. of the introduction to their Report will be found the reasons given by Drs. Thorpe, Oliver, and Cunningham for periodical examination. These are that there is something beyond mere actual necrosis; there is the general effect of phosphorus on the system, which can only be detected in time by periodical examination. The Home Office attach the highest importance to periodical examination in regard to lead poisoning, and yet they cut out the rules that relate to periodical examination of the workers in phosphorus. The rules, which were originally weak, were further weakened, and are now out of date. Already Messrs. Bryant and May are working outside the rules, which really apply only to white phosphorus, and are entirely inapplicable to a large branch of the trade. Personally I believe that there is a chance of international action on this subject. The imported matches mostly ignite only on the box, and as regards "strike anywhere" matches Messrs. Bryant and May have shown us that perfectly safe matches can be manufactured. We have in the case of phosphorus what we have not reached in the case of lead—a stage of absolute certainty—the result being that Switzerland, who is in advance of us in these matters, prohibits the importation of dangerous matches. The matter is one of daily trade, and the condition of things disclosed in the report of Drs. Thorpe, Oliver, and Cunningham is such that the Home Office cannot contend that we are in this country up to the level of the Continental countries with regard to the match industry. There is one other point. The Annual Report furnishes a curious illustration as to the non-observance of the law with regard to Sunday labour in factories, especially in creameries. At pages 105 to 108 of the Report it is shown how the law is broken. The Report states that Sunday labour can be avoided, and shows how. It advises that the employers shall be told that the law in the future will be strictly enforced. But the course which is taken by the Home Secretary appears not to be to tell the employers that the law will be enforced, but rather to intimate to the employers that the law may be altered to suit their evil practices. When there is some objection to or some difficulty about applying the law the breaking of the law is encouraged by Ministers meeting a deputation and saying that the law shall be amended to suit their convenience. I thank the Committee for the kindness and courtesy with which they have heard me, and can only say that unless I hear something very different to what I have heard or read up to the present time on the first point I have raised, I shall feel it my duty to divide the Committee. I beg to move the reduction standing in my name.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £96,307, be granted for the said Service."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I think the House is to be congratulated upon the admirable speech to which it has just listened, and also upon the fact that although the right hon. Baronet had all the materials to bring a very strong indictment against the Home Office, he has refrained from attacking it upon this subject. For the last three years hon. Members on both sides of the House have joined together in trying to help the Home Secretary and one another to bring about a practical reform, not only in the way of new legislation, but in the administration of the existing laws. The hon. Gentleman on my right will, I hope, presently deal exhaustively with this question, upon which he is a great authority. There are only one or two points upon which I will address the House. One is with regard to the employment of women inspectors. We have continually pressed that question upon the attention of the Home Secretary, and I hope that now, upon the new facts that have been placed before the right hon. Gentleman, he will see his way to bring about a reform upon which we all lay much stress. Another direction in which we may do a good deal is in international action. We have pointed out to the Home Secretary that there has been a great opportunity for bringing about something like united action. I am aware that great difficulties lie in the way and have to be overcome, but a first step must be taken, and I suggest that it should be taken this year by those who represent the Home Office at the conference which is to be held at Paris. The Report that has been issued this year is the best Report, in my opinion, that was ever issued by the Home Office, and I should like to say it has saved us years and years of labour. It is a volume of 500 pages, full of all sorts of information, but I notice that it is absolutely innocent of any sort of index, and in consequence persons who wish to follow the substance of that Report have great difficulty in arriving at the facts and figures. With regard to the right hon. Baronet's suggestion as to the new rules, I think, as they were only issued last year, it is rather early to press the Home Secretary for definite information, although on that point the right hon. Gentleman will, I have no doubt, be able to give us some information later on. The Report is full of information obtained by the right hon. Gentleman from abroad. The Home Office I think has learned a great deal as to legislation and administration and inspection in foreign countries, and if that information could be systematized and brought within the reach not only of hon. Members but also of the large employers, very great steps in advance might be taken without the interference of the Home Secretary in the future. I should like again to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the absolute chaos which exists with regard to legislation affecting the employment of children in factories. I will not weary the Committee with what I said last year upon this point, but will merely draw attention to the fact that the number of statutes upon the Statute-book are perplexing in their variety, and I think some step should be taken by the Home Office to prepare the way for a codification of these statutes, and some effort should be made to bring the entire administration under one Department. Any person interested in the administration of the laws is aware that they go from one Department to another, and that it is almost impossible to get any satisfaction from them. There is one other point with regard to this. The Act introduced by the hon. Member for South Shields will only have the effect of forcing the children into the street, which is most undesirable, unless something further is done. There are still an immense number of accidents through cleaning machinery whilst in motion, and a great many evils with regard to children in factories, and there certainly ought to be some further information as to physical fitness. These are all matters which the Home Secretary can deal with in his administrative capacity, and if he causes his inspectors to be more active much can be done. The next point upon which we might ask for the views of the Home Secretary is with regard to the information contained in the present Report with regard to laundries; both as to meal times and sanitation there appears from the Report to be room not only for legislation, but for more active administration in the future. Then there is the point as to the organisation of the staff of the Home Office. We have also here, as elsewhere, to recognise the enormous improvements produced by the Home Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman who preceded him. The right hon. Gentleman was always thought to be extremely disregardful in these matters, but nobody can read the Report without acknowledging that great improvements have been brought about this last year. I really think, except in the case of one or two years when the late Home Secretary was in office, there has rarely been so much done in one year. I find in one case that no less than 29,662 entries have been made of factories and workshops in the register of the Home Office in the present year; that represents an immense amount of extra work, and I think the Home Secretary will have a very strong case upon which to go to the Treasury for assistance in this matter. More staff is required for special inquiry, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to have it. Many other improvements might be made in the administration of the Act, but, to my mind, anybody who reads the Report and compares the work done by the Department of the Home Office with the work done by any other body in Europe will find that the lead inspectors have done remarkably good work. I am aware that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University is going to raise that question. The question of the Truck Acts has already been raised, and I know there are many hon. Members who have studied different matters in the Report to which they will call the attention of the House. I will not trespass on the Committee longer. I should like to say to the Home Secretary that I consider the work done by his Department during the past year shows an advance on what has been done in any year since the Government came into office.

*MR. TENNANT (Berwickshire) said that in rising to take part in the discussion it was very satisfactory to be able to look at the pleasing side of the picture, and he wished to join the hon. Member for Derby in congratulating the right hon. Gentleman opposite on the changes which had occurred. In the first place, the earlier issue of the Report was a matter for considerable congratulation. The Report dealt with a wide area, and demonstrated very clearly the great benefit which had been derived from the re-organisation of the Department of which the right hon. Gentleman had charge. But it was not their business only to congratulate ministers upon what had already been done. They must look forward and therefore he turned to look at the other side of the picture. The future, he was sorry to say, was somewhat dark. There were many points to which he might refer in addressing the Committee, but perhaps he would be most usefully occupied if he spoke on the question of dangerous trades. He did not wish to be egotistical, but he must refer to the Committee over which he had the honour to preside from 1895. That Committee issued five Reports—the first in 1896, and the final last year. The Committee were given twenty-six trades to investigate, and of these they found seventeen which required special control. Special rules were recommended for these seventeen trades, but the Committee would be surprised to learn that in only two of them had the recommendations been adopted. How long it would require to put the whole into force at the present rate was a little difficult to ascertain, but he calculated that it would be not less than thirty-four years. He sincerely hoped that that calculation might be falsified, and that the recommendations would be embodied in special rules long before that time. He would like to give illustrations of the necessity for the embodiment of special rules for the trades which were inquired into, and in regard to which, so far, nothing had been done. He instanced bronzing and paper staining. The questions of air space, ventilation, overcrowding, heated rooms, and flaring gas jets were familiar to every reformer in the House. These were the evils which the Factory Acts were designed to meet. On these evils many eloquent passages had been written, but none more eloquent than were to be found in the Blue-book issued last week as to the difficulty of getting conditions suitable to the health and welfare of young girls where no dust was generated. How much more difficult must it be in cases where the industry was carried on under dusty conditions, and how much more necessary to have good ventilation, good air space, and no overcrowding in industries where there was dust. Bronzing and paper staining were both dusty industries. Bronze dust was constantly flying about in the atmosphere. He maintained in connection with these industries there ought to be some sort of standard of ventilation. Although a Report on the subject was issued four years ago, nothing had been done. He should like to read to the Committee an extract from the Report for 1898, where Mr. Sydney Smith says—

> "One girl, who had milk supplied twice daily, was suffering from severe nausea, and other symptoms of copper poisoning, at the time of my visit. She had not been employed more than three months. Her mother, whom I afterwards saw, told me that previously she had enjoyed the best of health, but since working with the bronze she had suffered from loss of appetite, dizzy pains in the head, constipation, and sickness."

These facts were not new. An exactly similar statement of facts was brought before the right hon. Gentleman some time ago, and yet, as he had said, nothing had been done. The next trade to which he wished to refer was that of inflammable paints, where there was one of the clearest cases possible for interference by the State. These quick-drying paints, which are used principally for ships, have for their base a spirit, instead of oil. He remembered that the Committee took a sample and had it analysed, with the result that it was found to have a flashing point below 45 degrees Fahr. He guaranteed that the atmosphere of that House was more than 45 degrees, and if that was so it could easily be imagined how dangerous such a paint as that must be for those using it. The substance was so inflammable that a gallon of it diffused in the air would make forty-eight cubic feet of air absolutely inflammable. Cases of severe burning constantly occurred. On account of the ignorance of the people substances of this kind were constantly used in confined places, such as bunkers and the holds of vessels, where artificial light was required. The Committee made five distinct recommendations. They recommended that these inflammable paints should not be used (1) in any confined space; (2) where artificial light other than electric light was used; (3) for a longer period than five hours a day, nor more than two and a-half hours at a time; (4) by any young person; (5) by less than three men without the foreman visiting them every hour. With regard to the question of file cutting, the Report issued last week (page 306) says—

"It will be noticed that in this industry the percentage of severe attacks is highest. The number of chronic cases is very large. The number of cases in which paralysis appears as a symptom is greatly in excess of any other industry, and justifies what was said in the last annual report, that in no employment where lead is used do the symptoms suggest so much incapacitating illness as file cutting."

He thought it would be unnecessary to go any further than that, for it must be obvious that file cutting was an industry which ought to be carried on under such rules as would give protection to the workers. Passing to the question of railway accidents inside factories, he said that last year he put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary when an accident occurred inside a works at Sheffield. The right hon. Gentleman said there was a Royal Commission sitting inquiring into the subject of railway accidents, and he thought the question might be dealt with by them. He wrote to Lord James, the Chairman of the Commission, who thanked him for bringing the matter before his notice, but stated that, much as he would like to be able to interfere, he did not think the matter was one that came within the scope of his inquiry. He then brought the matter before the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who referred him to the Home Office, but the Secretary of State replied that he had really no jurisdiction over private sidings. In the Committee upstairs on the Railways (Prevention of Accidents) Bill, he referred to what Mr. Whitelegge stated in evidence before the Royal Commission (No. 787)—

"We do not regard a private siding as coming under the Factory Department, so far as it is outside the curtilage of the factory itself."

Mr. Tennant.

Mr. Hopwood, who was examined before the Royal Commission, speaking of accidents, said (No. 791)—

"We think we do not get the whole [cases reported], because it is not clear under the Act of Parliament that there is any obligation on the part of the company to report them."

Yet fifty-six fatal accidents occurred in 1898, and were reported (No. 775). They knew perfectly well that when there was an obligation to report, accidents were sometimes not reported; and it stood to reason that where there was no obligation to report, accidents might occur on factory sidings which they did not hear about at the Home Office. He begged the right hon. Gentleman to take this matter into consideration, because he could not help thinking that this was one requiring interference. Why had nothing been done? The right hon. Gentleman would probably say that something had been done. He would turn to page 18 of the Report, where, with regard to Bessemer converters, it states—

"In view of the general compliance with the recommendations of the Committee it was not considered necessary to take any further steps for the present in the establishment of special rules."

The right hon. Gentleman would say they had got the recommendations adopted without going to the expense of issuing special rules. His argument would be that they should not go to the trouble and expense of issuing rules if they could get what they wanted in this way. If the desired result was secured by the adoption of suggestions and recommendations without friction, delay, and trouble, it meant that ease was purchased at the expense of uniformity of administration and of security of law. The Home Office was abrogating the rights of its position; instead of insisting upon the law being enforced it placed itself in the position of a suppliant, and that was a position it had no right to occupy. He desired also to refer to last year's Report of the chief inspector in reference to the question of bronzing. On page 136 there were these words—

"Milk is not given to the workers engaged in the process except in a few cases, though I have been informed by several occupiers that formerly this was the general custom in the trade. Several gave as an excuse for discontinuing the practice—'present trade competition'; none, however, offered any objection to provide milk if all were compelled to do the same."

That was just the point. If all were compelled to do the same, the thing would be done. He would like to give another illustration from the same Report—

"A woman who had been employed for six months, suffering from ophthalmia and eruptions on the face, complained of nausea. I advised the manager to change her to some other work, which has been done with beneficial results."

Could a plainer illustration be given? If there had been special rules enjoining periodical medical examination there could not be the slightest doubt that the woman would never have had ophthalmia or eruptions, but as it was, if this inspector had not been one of the best, the woman in all probability would have been going on still. Moreover, if the Home Office, instead of having special rules, continued to rely on its power of persuasion, employers might at first agree to its suggestions, but if in putting them into operation they turned out to be more expensive than was anticipated the employers might then object and refuse to carry them out. What the public desired and demanded, both in the interest of the workers and in the interest of fairness as between competitive firms, was that there should be uniformity of administration and security of law. Mr. Sydney Smith, of Manchester, illustrates this need in the Report for 1899; he says—

"At the present time some occupiers seem to think that any trough or bucket is a suitable washing convenience. Working men require educating somewhat in these matters, and will wash themselves, but require a little tempting and coaxing. This, at least, is my experience. If proper accommodation is provided at hand they will wash, but if the accommodation is defective or dirty, or even worse, we cannot blame them if they neglect this precaution."

That pointed clearly to the difficulty of the ordinary definition of "suitable and sufficient," which should be met by special rules. Mr. Jackson, of Walsall, said—

"Almost all file cutters' shops in this district are low, with bad floors (usually earth), ill ventilated, crowded to their full legal capacity, and the washing accommodation that I have been able to get provided consists generally of a bucket or basin with a tap some distance away."

That showed that the inspectors were at a great disadvantage in not having any legal power. Was it surprising that there was great difficulty in keeping the industrial population free from poisoning owing to the trade in which they were engaged? There was another point, and that was one referred to in the final Report of the Dangerous Trades Committee, in regard to deaths or illness reported as being due to causes other than those to which they should really be attributed. The Committee, on this point, reproduced in their report a paragraph from the Report of the Registrar General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, in which it was stated that certain figures

"leave no room for doubt that the deaths which are definitely certified as due to plumbism constitute but a small proportion of the deaths really due to poisoning by lead among workers who are exposed to its influence."

The Committee made definite suggestions to the Home Office to the effect that when a man or woman died who, during any portion of the three months preceding death, had been employed in any of the known dangerous trades, the death should be reported by the registrar of deaths, and an investigation made in order to ascertain if death had occurred from unnatural causes.

Again, there was the question of certifying surgeons. There were a number of these gentlemen scattered over the country, their duties being threefold: they had to certify children and young persons as fit for certain employments in factories, they had to examine other persons at certain stated periods and certify them as fit or otherwise for employment in certain unhealthy processes; and they had also to examine into and report upon accidents when, under certain conditions, those accidents were required by statute to be reported to them. Apart from the difficulty under which these gentlemen suffered from having no legal right of entry into the factories into which the young persons they had to certify were about to enter, there were other considerations which were worthy of attention. He disclaimed any intention or desire to cast any imputation upon these gentlemen, some of them eminent, many of them undertaking the duties out of pure zeal for the public service, and generally for very slender or totally inadequate remuneration. Each factory district had its own certifying surgeons, who were invariably, as far as he was aware, chosen from among the local medical practitioners. Their livelihood, if they were high up in the profession, depended upon being employed by the richer people of the district. In an industrial district, such as was to be constantly met with in Lancashire, the West Riding, the Midlands, or the West of Scotland, the richer men were almost entirely connected with the large factories in the neighbourhood, either as managers, partners, or directors. A certifying surgeon was therefore constantly placed in a most difficult and invidious position; he had to choose between certifying as fit for employment those whom he would rather see engaged in a harmless trade, and refusing to certify them, thereby giving offence, very likely, to one of his principal clients. That was an unfair position in which to put any gentleman. There were over 2,000 of these certifying surgeons—in some places, such as Manchester or Birmingham, there were as many as half a dozen. How could five or six different gentlemen, without a standard to work by, be expected to take the same view of a given set of circumstances? One doctor might think a girl fit to be employed in a dusty occupation, while another, with a higher standard, would say she was unfit. It was thus impossible to obtain uniformity of administration in this admittedly important department of industrial life. He often wondered whether the right hon. Gentleman was fully alive to the benefits to be derived from uniformity of administration, but as he had already touched upon that matter, he would not weary the Committee with a repetition of his remarks. He might, however, he asked what his counter-scheme to the present arrangement would be. He would suggest that, instead of appointing certifying surgeons to each district from each district, there should be an effective medical branch of the Home Office, that Department being so largely concerned in health questions. The excellent arrangement already so admirably inaugurated under Dr. Legge might be extended and developed in order to meet this urgent necessity. There might be a staff of doctors to act directly under the instructions of the Chief Medical Inspector of the Home Office, more particularly with regard to the standard of fitness for employment. Many young doctors of great ability would be willing to serve under such conditions in order to gain the experience which could be obtained in that way. The fees now paid to the certifying surgeons direct should be paid instead to a central fund and go towards the payment of the surgeons. The fund should be administered by the Home Office. Under such a scheme very little outlay, if any, would be required on the part of the State. But even if a part, or even the whole, of the cost had to be borne by the State, the advantages to be gained—namely, the security of having the law administered by an officer in a position of perfect freedom, the almost invaluable statistics which could be collected by such a staff, and the inestimable benefit of uniformity in the administration of these delicate and important duties—would be cheaply purchased.

MR. COGHILL was of opinion that the House of Commons was a most inappropriate body to discuss the delicate questions which arose in connection with lead poisoning. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean had not only found fault with the figures, but he had also found fault with the Chief Inspector of Factories in the Northampton district. Nobody seemed to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman in that district. They had had a very interesting discussion before on this subject, and not only the inspectors, but the stipendiary magistrate appointed by the late Home Secretary, were found fault with. He could have understood this complaint if the magistrate had been appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the present Home Secretary, but this magistrate was a Radical, and yet hon. Gentlemen opposite were not satisfied. He did not think that full justice had been done to Mr. Walmsley's Report. He said in his Report to the Home Office on the Stoke-on-Trent district—

"I do not think that the full benefit of the special rules of May and October of 1898 will be felt for some time to come, but with the introduction of the medical examination there has been undoubtedly a considerable improvement in the appearance of those workers who have to undergo such examination. On this point the certifying surgeon will no doubt have assured you of the improvement, but from my own observation one cannot but be pleased with the brighter and more cleanly appearance of the workers in the lead processes."

It seemed to him that that was very important testimony coming from the official responsible to the Home Office. He went on to point out that there were great difficulties in keeping soap and other things on the premises, as there were always a certain number of workpeople who would take them away. He thought Mr. Walmsley's Report was a clear and able one as to the working of the special rules in the Potteries during the year. With regard to articles of leadless glaze, he wished to remind the Committee that, in regard to a great many of them, there was a serious doubt as to whether they did not contain a certain amount of lead in their composition. He thought everyone who knew anything about their manufacture would admit that this question had by no means been solved up to the present time. There was a very interesting meeting held not long ago in Cavendish Square, at which Canon Gore was present. As far as that meeting went he entirely agreed with its conclusions, and he should be glad to see them universally adopted. Following that meeting there was a very interesting letter in the Westminster Gazette in regard to articles of leadless glaze, and stating where they could be obtained. As far as he had been able to ascertain no answer had been made to that letter in the columns of the Westminster Gazette, and people were still anxious to know whether they could get those articles sold in other shops. There was another important question which had not been referred to, and that was the question of foreign competition. He was perfectly aware that his hon. friend the Member for Derby was anxious that something should be done by international agreement. If that could be done, then by all means let it be done, for foreign competition was a subject which should not be lost sight of in dealing with this question. If the question was to be dealt with practically, by all means let it be dealt with internationally, but in this respect he wished to point out that there were a large number of restrictions in force at the present time in this country which did not exist in the majority of countries abroad. The result was that foreign countries were allowed to send over here as much ware as they chose, to the injury of our own manufacturers. In his opinion that was very unfair, and was a grave injustice as far as our own manufacturers were concerned. He thought that all foreign manufacturers should be put on the same footing as our own manufacturers, and whilst English manufacturers were subject to all sorts of restrictions, foreigners should not be allowed to disregard them. A great deal had been done by the new rules adopted by the right hon. Gentleman at the Home Office, and what they wanted now was more time for those rules to further develop. These customs of the trade had been going on for a great number of years, and it was very hard indeed to get rid of them all at once. But a great improvement had taken place, and he should like in this respect to quote the figures. In 1898 there were 457 cases of lead poisoning, and in 1899 there were 249 cases. In the first three months of this year there were 62 cases. If the Committee would compare those figures with the total figures for all the other trades in this country he thought they would agree with him that they were not very excessive. It must be remembered that all the lead poisoning done in this country was not done in the Staffordshire potteries, for there was a large amount of lead poisoning in other employments in various parts of the country. He said that because, in reference to this question, the brunt of the criticisms had been directed to the potteries. If, therefore, they were going to put down lead poisoning they should do so over the whole country, and not simply in the Potteries. They were all very anxious to get rid of the lead poisoning cases, but very great difficulties existed in regard to the enforcement of the regulations made by the Department. It was found very difficult to get the workpeople to wash as often as they ought to. As a rule they were in a great hurry to get away from their work, and they did not devote that attention to washing that they ought to do. The inspector called attention to the difficulties there were in the way of getting some of the women to wear overalls and other articles for their heads, because the women considered the precautions insisted upon unsightly, and they would not wear them. The inspector called attention to the fact that many manufacturers were indignant, and very justly indignant, at the way in which the women refused to wear what was provided for them at great expense in order to carry out the new requirements. The manufacturers had been put to very considerable expense in trying to meet the views of the Home Office, and he claimed on their behalf that they had loyally carried out the undertaking which they gave to the Home Office.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The hon. Member, not for the first time in the course of our discussions on the subject of lead poisoning, has introduced—and he is generally the only hon. Member to do it—a tone of partisanship, and, if I may say so, committed a breach of taste and good manners this afternoon in speaking about a drawing-room meeting at which feminine diatribes were indulged in by a lot of well-dressed ladies. In my opinion they could not have been better engaged at that drawing-room meeting than in discussing the means by which their poorer sisters could be exempted from the tragedy of lead poisoning. It may not be as pleasant as sitting on the Terrace or having strawberries at a garden party; but I would suggest to the hon. Member that when the Duchess of Sutherland, who deeply sympathises with the sufferers of lead poisoning, calls a meeting of Members of Parliament, medical men, nurses, and others who are kind hearted and mean well, she is to be congratulated, and I am prepared to congratulate the Duchess and to pat the Countess on the back and say, "Good luck, and God bless your work." In fact, if they hold another meeting, I shall be delighted to attend it and take tea with them. The hon. Member went further. He said that the speech of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean was more fitted for the Society of Arts than for the House of Commons. On this occasion, as on nearly every other occasion, the right hon Baronet has shown his typical knowledge and his characteristic sympathy, which have deservedly given him his world-wide reputation; and if he continues to make such speeches—which according to the hon. Member are only fit for the Society of Arts—every working man in Staffordshire will bless him, and will overlook the sneers and insinuations of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent. The hon. Member also said that there were only two Members in the House of Commons who knew anything about pottery from the practical point of view. I do not know anything about pottery, but I know, as many hon. Members who defend the industry know also, that it is not necessary that the House of Commons should listen only to a few pundits in order to be able to form an opinion as to the medical and physiological injuries connected with it, and which have been confirmed by every one of the excellent doctors of the Home Office medical staff in their broad and general details. When the hon. Member introduces a Radical stipendiary, I say, with all respect, "Hang him." What has he got to do with the physiological effects of lead poisoning? If the hon. Member will take the excellent Report and Abstract of Labour Statistics prepared by Mr. Burton, who holds a brief for the employers, he will agree that the statements of the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, of the hon. Member for Berwickshire, and of the late Home Secretary have been more than confirmed. I do not wish to deal with any one appointed by the Home Office; I would prefer to leave that to the Home Secretary; but as to Mr. Walmsley, to whom the hon. Member referred, I think it would do no harm if he were transferred to a wider and more useful sphere of operations. The hon. Member also said that a great deal had been done during the last year or two in the pottery districts; but that has been due to the fact that pressure has been brought to bear by the Home Secretary on factory inspectors and on employers. The improvement which the hon. Gentleman admits has taken place is due to the very pressure that to-day he condemns. He urges as a reason why girls should suffer from lead-poisoning that the manufacturers have great difficulty in extending their works, but they have got plenty of space to enable them to adopt means for the healthy conduct of the industry. The hon. Member admits that the special rules have done a great deal of good; but these special rules are the outcome of criticisms in this House, which he has condemned this afternoon. They are the outcome of the pressure brought to bear in this House in the years 1892 and 1893. Irishmen say, "Who fears to speak of '98?" I am delighted to speak of '93, and the excellent work which was then done by the Home Secretary. But because the special rules have done so much, is that any reason why we should not abolish arbitration in relation to them, which would carry us ever so much further? The hon. Member used that blessed phrase "foreign competition." I must tell the hon. Member that doctors do not agree with him as regards foreign competition. They have proved to the Home Secretary that in the matter of dealing with lead poisoning our foreign competitors are better than we are, and surely what is good enough for a German is good enough for a Briton, and even if these rules should affect competition to the extent of a few thousands a year, it would not last long. I rely on the skill of our workmen and the energy of our manufacturers to make up for it by adapting their industry to the new conditions. Wherever restrictions have been imposed they have always resulted in permanent benefit. The only thing the hon. Member did say that had either justice or sympathy in it was his reference to refractory workpeople; but I should like to point out to the hon. Member that the masters are responsible for that. If the lead workers persistently disobey the factory rules, and in so doing impose on themselves and others physical disabilities, let one or two of them be sacked, and that danger will soon be put a stop to. I am done with the hon. Member and will pass from him to a doctor. Will the House of Commons listen to a few facts on the authority of a medical man? The tragedy of this story is almost appalling. There is in Staffordshire a Dr. Prendergast. He is a properly qualified man, and has written several treatises on lead poisoning. He is trusted by the workers, and he is the doctor for the men's Union and their Friendly Society, and as a rule workers select the best men of the medical profession for this class of work. Listen to his story. On 21st March, 1900, at a meeting of Friendly Societies in Staffordshire, Dr. Prendergast made a remarkable speech based on cases not taken from the Daily Mail or any other sensational rag of that kind, but from his own clinical note-book, the result of his two years observation. He had 285 cases of lead poisoning in that period, of which 162 were women. Of these 12 were totally blind, 7 were insane, 46 were partially blind; or 65 out of the 162 were either blind, partially blind, or insane. Of the 123 men 4 were totally blind, 26 were partially blind, and 75 were completely paralysed. I say to the House of Commons that that bald statement from the clinical note-book of that doctor is good enough to justify meetings in every drawing-room in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. Of these 285 men and women 170 were either blind, partially blind, insane, or paralysed. Eleven had died, and therefore out of the total 181 were either dead, blind, partially blind, or paralysed. Twenty-one of the 162 women had 80 miscarriages of children due to lead poisoning, and 24 of the children born alive of these women died from convulsions in the first year of their infantile life. These are plain facts from the clinical note-book of a doctor who, from his position, is qualified to speak, and if the ladies of England will continue to hold drawing-room meetings, and if doctors will continue to make speeches of that character, I say, "God bless the ladies, and good luck to the doctors!" Here is another illustration from the same doctor. Speaking of the destructive evils of lead poisoning, he stated that thirty cases had been treated with the electric bath and twenty had been cured, at an average cost of £14 each. If the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent wants to help his trade, let him spend £14 per man who has lead poisoning, in removing the causes that have made lead poisoning possible; and if he does that he will find that there is a saving in running the factories, and there need be no fear of foreign competition. His own speech indicates that these improvements can be brought about by better fans and better ventilation, and I would like to add by higher wages and shorter hours. Are Dr. Prendergast's ghastly figures true, or are they not? The point that concerns me is that there are far too many of these cases of poisoning at the present moment; and it is the duty of the House of Commons to devise some means by which they can be lessened. When I went a few minutes ago on to the Terrace I saw a dream of fair women which might appeal to the heart of any man, and I could not help contrasting these beautiful, well-dressed, fine-set-up, and, I believe, sympathetic women with the condition of the poor women in the potteries, of the same flesh and blood, as pictured by Drs. Oliver and Thorpe; the only difference between them being that the one earns the profit and the other spends it. I am positively convinced that if these fair women on the Terrace could only realise the awful conditions under which their sisters in the potteries are compelled to labour, there is no sacrifice they would not make to improve them. I appeal to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent whether this lead poisoning can be stopped. Let us go to Drs. Oliver and Thorpe. They say that the use of raw lead is not necessary either for colour or brilliancy, and that even where it is necessary it is used in excessive proportion for the production of proper work, that fritted lead can be used, and that for most kinds of ware suitable leadless glazes are now available. I believe that if the Home Secretary, with that kindliness of heart which distinguishes him, would only take up the suggestions of Drs. Oliver and Thorpe, and rigorously enforce them, the number of cases of lead poisoning would be halved in two years. In this way no damage would be done to the trade, and the worst manufacturers would be brought up to the level of the best. All through the doctors' Report there is evidence that they are wrestling strenuously with the bad manufacturers, and the non-enthusiastic inspectors, to bring the trade up to a proper level. The hon. Member for Stoke-on Trent says that all the lead poisoning does not belong to Staffordshire. According to Mr. Burton there were 4,703 workers liable to lead poisoning, or one in every ten, of those employed in Staffordshire. Taking the figures for 1897 and 1898, with their 386 or 400 cases of lead poisoning, it would only take twelve years to have the whole of the 4,703 affected with lead poisoning in one form or another. That squares with Dr. Prendergast, and confirms the Home Office, and is, generally speaking, eloquent of the fact that the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent does not know everything about lead poisoning, and does not know much about the Home Office. In the abstract of statistics in the inspector's Report, I find that there were in 1899, 1,258 cases of lead poisoning in all trades; in 1898, 1,278; and in 1897, 1,214. Making every allowance for suspensions, there has been practically no improvement at all; and there will be no improvement in this evil until the spirit of the speech of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent is crushed out in Staffordshire, until women inspectors are appointed, until the worst manufacturers are brought up to the level of the best, until the recommendations of Drs. Oliver and Thorpe are adopted, until the Home Office rules are enforced most rigidly, until all special rules are got rid of, until arbitration is abolished, and until absolute conditions are imposed on manufacturers from which there shall be no appeal to arbitration, the same as in other industries. I think that in this question of lead poisoning the time has arrived for calling an international conference. We suggested it in the Grand Committee on Trade in 1892 and 1893. I know of no subject on which an international conference would be more heartily welcomed by all the nations of the world than a conference which would fix the maximum number of hours for workers in lead, and the exemption of women from labour at certain periods of their lives, and raise the standard of ventilation. If the Government could send Lord Pauncefote to the Hague to an international tribunal to regulate the conditions of war, I see no reason why there should not be an international tribunal to regulate the conditions of peaceful industry. I leave lead poisoning and come to other branches of the Home Office work. I say it with the greatest pleasure that the Home Secretary has given us this year a Report which fully deserves the encomiums that have been passed upon it. I wish he would in future introduce into it more of these admirable comparative tables and diagrams which appear this year. We want an index, and a medical summary, so that we may get at the facts much more easily than we can now. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean quoted Dr. Rawdon Smith. I do not believe that that doctor is sympathized with by the Home Secretary. Dr. Rawdon Smith delivered a speech which led one to believe that he was pulling the Home Office by the ear, and that whatever he wanted the Home Secretary to do for the manufacturers, he had only to whisper it and it was done. Had I anything to do with the matter, Dr. Rawdon Smith and his intimidatory language would not be long tolerated; I would be prepared to treat him in the way he deserves. There is evidence of slowness of improvement during the last two or three years in certain branches of the Factory Acts Administration. There is also evidence of the fact that good trade means many deaths. High wages very frequently mean very low vitality. The Home Secretary must see that good trade and high wages, and even indifference on the part of workmen, do not lead to breaches of either sanitary laws or factory administration. I would suggest that when trade is good the pressure on masters and men should increase with the rising prosperity. Whatever else it discloses, the Report indicates that we have not worsened trade or diminished the number of factories and workshops. I wish to direct the attention of the House of Commons to what the cost is of all this good trade and prosperity—to the casualty list not from South Africa, but from the battlefields of industry. Last year 6,531 men met their deaths on our railways, in our mines, and in our factories and workshops, or about 400 more than the year before. Beyond that, the report of the Home Office indicates an enormous increase in the number of accidents. The minor accidents jumped up from 38,335 to 47,989; accidents reported to certifying surgeons showed an increase of from 19,227 to 22,711; fatal accidents, an increase from 727 to 871. All this indicates that, though much has been done by the Home Office, there is much more to do. We have got to do everything in our power to stop this casualty list. I say that the Home Office should not allow the number of all reported accidents, apart from the 6,531 killed, to jump up from 57,562 to the enormous total of 70,760, as they did last year. Whether we do our duty or not, whether the Home Office officers administer their powers under existing legislation more vigorously or not, of this I am certain: that all doctors are agreed that there are too many deaths and too many accidents, and that lead-poisoning ought to disappear. I rejoice that we have reached the stage when, with hardly a single exception, both sides of the House look upon this disease and slaughter and accident as more or less preventible.

> "Before man made us citizens, great Nature made us man."

For the sake of our manhood, we ought to make such statistics as those of Dr. Prendergast impossible. We ought to strengthen the Home Secretary's hands in reducing the terrible tale of disease, injury, and death; and to co-operate with the Home Office in doing everything in our power to place the army of British workmen where it ought to be—in the forefront of industrial production.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): This question of lead poisoning in the Potteries has been so thoroughly and exhaustively dealt with that I will confine my remarks, for the most part, to the kindred occupation of match making. All that has been said by previous speakers as to the terrible results of lead poisoning applies with equal if not with increased force to the results of phosphorus poisoning. I remember when the hon. Member for Berwick brought a deputation to see the Home Secretary in regard to lead poisoning, I was very much struck by the marked effect on the Home Secretary of the terrible instances presented to his notice, the very women themselves who were in a critical condition. If I may be pardoned for saying so, I think the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent has been somewhat severely dealt with, for some of his remarks in regard to the lead industry were very much to the point and practically true. There are great difficulties in securing a leadless glaze which will be at once effective and certain, and therefore I am not one of those who attack indiscriminately the manufacturers in the Pottery districts. I know that the question of foreign competition comes in, and we should press the Home Secretary strongly to use all his influence in the direction of bringing about an international conference in order that some agreement may be come to among manufacturers here and in foreign countries as to the use of lead and other matters connected with the industry. Of late persons employed in the match-making trade have been somewhat overlooked, and for this reason: that some ten or eleven years ago there was a great outcry in the press with reference to the terrible disease to which those who work in phosphorus are subject—namely, necrosis, or phossy jaw. The agitation has not been heard of for some time, owing to the fact that one or two of the large manufacturers have adopted an amorphous form of phosphorus, and that in these factories the amount of phosphorism generally, and necrosis in particular, has decreased to some extent. With reference to the Report which has been so highly praised, a remark has been made in regard to the want of an index. We should be glad to have an index, but if the preparation of an index were to delay the issue of the Report until it is practically useless to us, then I would rather do without the index. The new rules which apply to lucifer match-making have been amended by arbitration, but I would like to point out, as I did on a previous occasion, that the arbitration is one-sided. Those mainly concerned, the workpeople, have nothing whatever to do with the matter. The Home Office appointed one man, the manufacturers another; then they fixed upon a third, as umpire. But what occurred when these special rules, of which I have reason to complain, were framed? The manufacturers withdrew their man—a very distinguished Member of this House—and the umpire was told that his services were not required; and the result was that the Home Office nominee sat as sole arbitrator—a gentleman who sat on a previous occasion in connection with the old Factory Acts, and had not the confidence of the workers. Now, we have to protect our workers—not that I think the manufacturers should not be amply and fairly protected. They are. But these rules were framed, as the Home Secretary himself acknowledged, upon the lowest basis; and then they went before the sole arbitrator, by whom they were whittled down to practically nothing at all. When on a previous occasion I admitted that, in my opinion, the rules, taken as a whole, were a slight improvement on the previous rules, the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean seemed to be opposed to that opinion. Since then I have gone carefully into the matter, and I am prepared to admit that all the improvements in the rules are not of any importance. In the phosphorus industry, as I shall call it, the main conditions which affect the workers are ventilation and cleanliness. In regard to ventilation, we find this extraordinary state of things. Rule 2, after specifying what the ventilation should be, goes on to say, "Unless the use of fans is dispensed with by order, in writing, by the Chief Inspector." Therefore, the absolute power is practically put into the hands of the Chief Inspector of overruling the opinion of the distinguished experts who, after careful inquiry into the case, had framed the original rules. Rule 3 refers to mixing, dipping, and drying — the most important processes in the manufacture of matches. It says that the boxing is not to be done until the matches are thoroughly dry, and then it must be done in a separate room. A distinction is drawn between matches that are dry, and those that are not thoroughly dry. We have it on the authority of the inspectors that it is impossible to frame a definition of a thoroughly dry match. The evidence goes to show that, so far as wax matches are concerned, there is no danger, but in regard to other matches it is impossible to define what is a dry match. It will be seen by these rules that the whole welfare of those who work in phosphorus depends upon the three processes of mixing, dipping, and drying; and in all of these processes the question of ventilation is of the greatest importance. And yet the Chief Inspector has the power of altering the rules regarding ventilation! But really the most important point in connection with the rules is the fact that the periodical examination of the workers by a surgeon has been dispensed with. In the rules we gain a little in one direction, and lose largely in another. There is a gain in the provision of antiseptics for the workers to wash in, but that is as nothing, placed against the fact that periodical examination by a surgeon is done away with, for the latter gives up altogether the question of phosphorism. Much experience has been gained in Germany and Austria in regard to the conditions of the match industry, and in these countries it is acknowledged on all hands—an opinion which, it is important to note, Dr. Whitelegge, the Chief Inspector, himself endorses—that phosphorus has a deteriorating effect upon the constitution generally, over and above the creation of necrosis, or phossy jaw, from which the workers are so liable to suffer. I am prepared to admit that, given the worker who works in phosphorus, who has sound teeth, the chances are altogether against that individual getting phossy jaw if he or she takes the proper precautions, or of their having their general health deteriorated by phosphorism. But it is an undoubted fact that there are cases where the workers have not suffered from necrosis, but have suffered from the general effects of phosphorus on the system. My hon. friend the Member for Battersea has referred to the disastrous effect of it on women in a delicate state of health—a peculiar effect which naturally in the long run leads to the breaking down of the woman's constitution. We find that owing to the periodical examination by the surgeon being done away with, we have the surgeon placed in a secondary position, underneath the dentist. Periodical examination still takes place by the dentist, but no case is brought to the knowledge of the surgeon unless, as it were, the dentist passes it on to him. One other remark in regard to these rules. No. 12 refers to the question of washing. We find here that a trough of enamelled iron o. galvanised iron is substituted for the old single basins. Now Miss Squire, Her Majesty's Inspector, in her Report to the Chief inspector for 1898, page 160, uses the following words with reference to this point—

> "There was a determination on the part of many of the women not to wash their faces in troughs used by other women, a determination it was impossible not to respect"

It is well known that in all these dangerous trades one of the difficulties with which the employers have to contend is the gross carelessness of the employees, and to make them realise the necessity of washing, and the use of various equipments which are essential to those who work in these trades. Take the washing regulations in Rule 12. Almost everybody objected to the trough system, and it was a monstrous thing to introduce that system where the bulk of the employees had a distinct objection to it. I know that one of the points which will be raised by the Home Secretary will be that he has been cramped so far as these rules are concerned. But I would ask that there should be an amendment to the rules and procedure, in order that the standard may be higher. These rules are rendered lower still owing to this system of arbitration in which the employees have no part or voice whatever. All that has been said by previous speakers in connection with the pottery industry applies with even greater force to those engaged in the phosphorus trade, because it has been clearly shown in this particular trade that a remedy is possible, and possible without great difficulty being placed in the way of the manufacturers. We know that the Diamond match manufactory at Liverpool, when first these rules were brought out, came up and gave evidence in favour of the rules, and were quite ready to adopt them; and what is sufficient for one manufacturer should be good enough for another. Yet you give inspectors power under the rules to draw distinctions between manufacturers. What we want is to see all placed on the same basis. I know that in Switzerland and other countries better rules obtain than obtain at the present moment in this country. Therefore I am inclined to believe that if the right hon. Gentleman would make some effort in the direction of an international agreement a good result would be achieved. It is not less desirable when drawing up a new set of rules to see that those rules are not meddled with by arbitration, as they have been on previous occasions.

*MR. TALBOT (Oxford University) thought, after the very important discussion which had taken place, he might be permitted to draw the attention of the Home Secretary to another subject, to which the right hon. Gentleman had given some attention, but to which he hoped he would give more. The subject to which he referred was that of the fruit-preserving industry, a subject in which he was interested, and with regard to which in the previous session he had the honour to call the attention of the House. It appeared to him that there was a danger of the indulgence with regard to overtime, which was given necessarily to a certain extent, extending to other parts of the same industry, so that what might be a pardonable indulgence, if it was limited to a single class of work, might become unpardonable when extended. On this occasion he desired to confine himself entirely to the evidence of the inspectors of the Home Office itself, and would commence by asking attention to this paragraph of the Report of the past year—

"The washing of bottles for fruit-preserving is now added to the purposes for which 'overtime' is allowed, on the grounds that 'bottles for fruit-preserving purposes had to be supplied in large quantities at certain seasons, that the dates of delivery could not always be fixed long beforehand, that the washing had to be done very shortly before the time of actual delivery, that overtime under Section 53 of Factory and Workshops Act, 1878 (amended by Sections 14 and 37 of Factory and Workshops Act, 1895) was allowed in several similar cases, etc.' Accordingly, women may now be employed in this from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m., or 7 a.m. to 9 p.m., or 8 a.m. to 10 p.m., with two hours allowed for meals, and not more than three days in one week and more than thirty days in one year. But then, they may work overtime in other works, and so may have a much larger overtime in the year.

That, perhaps, did not sound so bad. But the chief lady inspector (page 266 of the Report) said—

"No experience since the materials for last year's Report were gathered and summarised has tended to modify my opinion that it is urgently required to bring the fruit-preserving industry, without any exemption, within the general regulations of the Acts."

That was the testimony of the chief lady inspector, not an adverse witness. The year had undoubtedly been a year of disappointments to those interested in the fruit-preserving and kindred industries, because they had hoped and expected, after the discussion in the previous year and the sympathy expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and his offer to protect the most unprotected, the children and young women, that this year legislation would be brought in to deal with the subject. The right hon. Gentleman brought in a Bill, it was true, but nothing more had been heard of it. Perhaps the reception it met with did not encourage the right hon. Gentleman to go further; but had the right hon. Gentleman had greater courage and pressed the Bill to a Second Reading, it was possible that Amendments might have been made on which legislation might have been made. As it was, the position was the same now as it was last year, except that a few new rules had been made. No permanent progress had been made, and as the Report for 1899 was necessarily meagre, he was driven back to the Annual Report of 1898 for his facts. Miss Paterson and Miss Deane report that—"It is not possible to have an accurate appreciation of the work of a jam factory without bearing in mind that almost every worker may be employed at one time or another in every part of every process which is carried on in the factory; thus (a) we have found girls employed in pouring hot jam who were employed on the previous afternoon in candying peel, and the previous night in bottle-washing."

All very homely occupations, but very exhausting to young natures.

"(b) We have found little girls carrying and stacking jars of jam, at night, who during the day had been employed in making potted meat."

So that some children were engaged upon one thing during the day and upon another at night.

"(c) We have found young girls making confectionery who went daily at the close of their normal hours to work in the jam-boiling room.

"(d) We have found girls employed in the warehouse in covering and labelling jam, who for two hours in the early morning and two hours late at night, and on Saturday afternoons, were busy bottling fruit."

The Committee would see that in all these cases the necessary indulgence which was given for certain purposes was about to be turned in this way into an unnecessary and a harmful indulgence. The Report continued—

"We have found a woman washing bottles, who, the day before our visit, had been engaged in unpacking and stacking clean jars, frequently attended to the 'gooseberry machine,' and when not so employed peeling onions in the pickle-making room. These are not isolated instances, but are examples of the conditions in the majority of factories."

In the subsidiary remarks of one of the inspectors she said—

"A table of the hours found to have been worked in a large factory in the week previous to our visit, and on the first three days of the week in which we visited. This gives a total of eighty-six hours (actual) exclusive of meals for seven days in one week."

"Owing in part to the moist state of the atmosphere, and the continual dripping of the condensed steam, but still more to the amount of water used, we have found the floors often unnecessarily wet, and in addition slippery with decaying vegetable refuse. No laundry floors equal those of most jam factories for wetness and dilapidation. Again, the existence of an exemption puts these matters beyond control, just when such control is most necessary."

So that he was perfectly accurate in saying that this laxity of administration was unfair to those who tried to carry out the law. The better class of manufacturers desired to carry out the law, and would do so but for the laxity of administration, which is only employed by the lower and worst class, which he was sure it is not the intention of the Committee to encourage. The inspectors continued—

"The repeal of the present 'total exemption' section—which makes it impossible to gauge accurately the full extent of the overwork, while it complicates all attempts to control effectually the conditions under which persons nominally working in 'regulated' departments are employed—would, we believe, be welcomed by the better class of manufacturers.

"This will leave the special exemption section, permitting sixty occasions of overtime annually for women in these factories, untouched. It would be well to ensure, in view of this double quantity of overtime, that when this special exemption is claimed, the other special exemption permitting thirty occasions of overtime in warehouses and in bottle-washing cannot also be legally taken advantage of.

"This would also put an end to the overwork of young persons under eighteen years, which is such a prominent result of the present total exemption."

He had now laid before the Committee the whole of the documentary evidence with which he proposed to trouble them. He thought he had made out a case for, at any rate, greater vigilance upon the part of the right hon. Gentleman. Much might be said for and against the protection of adult men, but what he was contending for was protection for a class whom everyone wished to see protected and who could not protect themselves, and it was with that view he had brought this matter to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

*Mr. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): The afternoon has been absorbed by an important discussion with regard to saving human life, and the hygiene of workshops, factories, and potteries. I desire to call attention to one very important subject in connection with saving the wages of the workers. I should like to ask for an expression of opinion from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary as to the policy of the Home Office on this matter. We have had now three years experience of the Truck Act of 1896—I desire to say nothing of the Truck Acts of 1831 and 1887, which had for their object the prevention of payment of wages in kind, because I consider those were excellent Acts, and they have been administered for the protection of the workers, and the inspectors and the Governments have been able to stamp out abuses which were rampant in the country so many years ago, which resulted in lowering wages. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean drew attention to the Donegal case, a breach of the Truck Act, 1831, and was justified in calling attention to what has taken place in Ireland in that respect. I should now like to ask the Home Secretary if he would state to the Committee the reason why he has not thought fit to give exemptions to certain important trades in the country which applied for those exemptions in 1897. We know how it came about that the exemption section crept into the Act. It was introduced after the report stage, owing to pressure brought to bear upon the Lancashire Members by the operatives of the cotton spinners. The hon. Member for Stockport, who now sits on this side of the House, had an Amendment to reject the Bill which he withdrew on the understanding that the 9th section should take its place. I have in my hand a list showing fifteen important trades which have applied for exemption, and according to this list only one trade has had exemption given to it—the cotton spinners of Lancashire and Yorkshire. I contend that it is very unfair administration by the Home Office to give one section of the workers exemption under Section 9, and to refuse it to other large industries where the employers and the employed have applied for it. When the Act passed the House in its third reading I ventured to make a prediction that the Act could not be applied to the heavy trades throughout the country, such as the iron, steel, and engineering trades. That prediction has been fulfilled, because in the heavy industries the Act is a dead letter. I then said that Section 2, which deals with damaged goods, would work hardship on the least united traders of the country, and anybody who reads the Reports of the last three years will see that that is the fact. I desire first to call attention to a test case that was tried in Ireland last year under the Truck Act of 1896, and the proceedings were taken by the inspector, where a factory girl was found talking in the factory and fined. The magistrate upheld the fine, much to the horror of the Home Office. Was it to be expected that women and young girls should work for twelve hours in a factory without talking? And because they talk they are fined. The girl worked in the constituency of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, but I do not know whether at the time she was discussing his conduct as a Member of this House. But to ask girls and women to work like dumb dogs for twelve hours is, in my opinion, a most disgraceful thing. In respect to Section 2 I must compliment the lady inspectors; I believe we have in them most excellent workers, who have endeavoured to administer and to see that the Act is administered. Miss Squire, who has taken a most active part in the administration, has reported on those matters. In the Report of 1897, she says—

"Two points have come out with special force in the year's experience of deductions or payments in respect of damage due to bad or negligent work, or injury by the worker to materials or other property of the employers. The first is the highly technical knowledge that must be gradually acquired by Her Majesty's inspectors as to the nature of the work and manufactured materials in the manifold industries under inspection in order to enable them to form an independent judgment as to what in fact constitutes bad or negligent work by the employed. The second is the immense difficulty of determining what are the essential circumstances which shall be held to decide the question, what is fair and reasonable deductions—that is, within the outside limits of estimated loss of the employer and (at common law) of the direct natural consequence of the negligence.

"The actual or estimated damage or loss occasioned by the employers often, where costly materials are used or the process is an intricate one, equals a sum which it would take the worker weeks or months to earn.

"Two illustrations may be given out of many cases which have come before me:—

"In a worsted spinning mill some damaged yarn occasioned a loss of £2 16s. to the firm; the damage was attributed to two spinners, young girls earning 8s. 6d. a week. These two were required to pay the sum between them, and to suffer a deduction of 6d. per week each from their wages until the whole was paid. This means to each girl a loss exceeding three weeks wages.

"Steam laundry washing machine packed costly silk underclothing damaged by a small green bag, got into the machine and coloured the garments. Damage £10. The women responsible earned 2s. 6d. per day. The employer observed there was nothing in the Truck Act to prevent his charging the whole amount to the worker."

What I want to know is, whether it was the intention of the Home Office when they passed this second section that these serious deductions should be made from the wages of these workers for any damage that they might do, or might be held to have done to the goods. Now, in the Report of 1898, Miss Squire further says—

"Nothing is more striking than the great divergence in practices and opinion with regard to fines.

"In some factories and workshops long lists are exhibited of rules, each accompanied by a fine for non-compliance, and should these lists be criticised the employer fights for the retention of each fine as if the very existence of the works depended upon it, drawing a terrible picture of the lawlessness and disorder which would prevail were fines not inflicted, while in other factories and workshops of the same class, and where as many or more persons are employed, fines are unknown, and the management tells you there is no need of them.

"It is probable that the system of fining itself creates the need which it supplies. Be this as it may, it is certain the secret is one of good management. Some managers, foremen, or forewomen seem to maintain order by their mere presence at the works, others only by severe pains and penalties.

"When the employer has allowed himself to be persuaded to abolish fines his verdict after a trial has so far always been favourable, and it is to be hoped more will try the experiment and thus encourage the growth of honour and esprit de corps among employers."

Again, Miss Squire says—

"Girls' and women's wages are, as a rule, so pitiably low as to leave no margin for making good damage done to work entrusted to them.

"As instances of charges for damaged work, which, although not equal in amount to the loss occasioned by the employers, are yet not fair and reasonable if the amount of wages is considered, the following may be given—

Kind of Work.	Wages Earned.	Deduction for Damage.
	d.	s. d.
One shirt	2½ ...	2 6
Six pinafores	9 ...	5 6
Two doz. hunting ties...	5 ...	14 0
Four doz. collars ...	8 ...	£1"

I say that any law which permits an employer of labour to deduct from the wages of girls such large sums as these, in view of the small sums paid in wages, is one which the Home Office should not tolerate but should bring in a Bill to repeal. We had a case tried this year in Scotland, in one of the sheriff courts, and I wish to draw the attention of the House to it, for it is a serious case. This was a case tried by order of the inspector. A girl was off work one day due to the illness of her mother. Under the rules on the placard posted up in pursuance of the Truck Act it was provided that if an employee lost a day she was liable to be fined a day's wages. This poor girl was earning only 7s. a week, and she lost a day's pay in consequence of being off work. That reduced her wages to 5s. 7d. She was fined 1s. 3d. for being off, and thus her wages were reduced to the pitiable sum of 4s. 4d. This case was taken into court, and there is an account of it in this year's Report by the Chief Factory Inspector, at page 279. The sheriff decided in favour of the employers. He held that it was legal under the Truck Act to deduct 1s. 3d. from the girl's wages. If you make it legal to deduct from this unprotected girl 1s. 3d. of her wages because she is off a day, why not make the same law applicable to all the professions of this country? I remember some years ago, before I became a Member of this House, I was upstairs attending a Committee in connection with the promotion of a Bill. We had engaged counsel, but that counsel never put in an appearance during the whole time the Bill was going through Committee. He charged us over £200. We paid for the work, although he did not put his face almost into the room. Then I ask, if it is fair, if it is the law that you should charge this girl or any worker a fine, and in addition deduct from her wages a day's pay because she is off work for a day—I ask the House of Commons, even with all its legal power, to make the same law applicable to men upstairs if they are engaged to do work and do not do it. Fine them in the same way and see how the law would work. I daresay barristers would not like a law of that kind. I wish to be very candid with Ministers. It was not legal until 1892 that a workman should be fined for not being at his work at the proper time, but if it has become legal, then I say apply the same law to the Treasury Bench. The Ministers are paid £5,000 a year, which I do not grudge. I believe they are entitled to it. Every day since I have been on these benches a Member comes into the House and puts a question to a Minister who is not there to reply. He is late and the result is he comes in and apologises. Why should he not be subject to the same law? [Laughter.] I say this is no laughing matter. It is a serious matter to thousands. I have got some papers here from the town of Birmingham with reference to a large number of deductions which occurred there, and I call attention to it because it is a most serious matter to workers who are not protected with respect to deductions and fines under the Truck Act of 1886. I come to a case which the Home Office tested last year before the stipendiary magistrate of Birmingham. There you have girls employed in works where they are liable to be fined for what is called "waste." Neither the stipendiary magistrate nor Miss Squire, the lady inspector, knows whether that waste is due to the inferior quality of the steel out of which pens are manufactured or to other causes. But the employers put it down to the girls; and what has been the result? These girls have been fined. A case was taken into court and tried before the stipendiary magistrate. The result was that he held that under the Truck Act the employer was justified in deducting this amount of "waste" from the wages of the poor girls. The result is that a girl earning 12s. a week is in debt to the extent of £2, others are in debt £5, and others £10, and there is no Member from Birmingham who will get up in the House of Commons—at least, they do not—to condemn a law that makes these girls subject to these serious deductions. It is a travesty when you think that we are trying to right things in South Africa—that we are shedding our blood and spending our money to right differences there—while here in Birmingham you have these poor girls working day after day and in debt £10, £5, and £2 for fines. I hold that the wages of a girl after she has performed her labour ought to be as sacred to her as the wages or earnings of any professional man in this country. In my opinion, the only proper settlement of this question is indicated in the Report of last year by Miss Squire. She argues with great force—and I would ask Members of the House to read the Report—that the only cure for this is to do away with the law of fining, and not permit employers of labour to deduct fines from the wages of workmen while acting as their own judge and jury as to what the fines should be. I speak as one who knows what it is to work for daily wages. I can tell you that I would not permit any employer of labour to deduct from my wages any fine. Every working man has a right to have his wages protected. If an employer is anxious to take from a workman any of his wages, to fine him, or to claim damages, then in my opinion he ought to take him into a court of law. The wages of a workman should be paid to him in their entirety in the current coin of the realm, and the law should not permit any deductions to be made. In 1891 a case came before Justice Grantham, who decided in favour of this right of deduction. It was, in fact, judge-made law, and I say it ought to have been the duty of the Government, if it were judge-made law, to have brought in a Bill to prevent employers from deducting from the wages of unprotected workmen the sums which I have pointed out. I have reviewed three years working of the Truck Act; I raised my voice alone in the House of Commons on the Third Reading; and I feel to-day, as then, that no Parliament depending on the votes of a broad electorate such as we have should continue to regard as legal that which I have described, and which I consider to be a scandal on the Statute-book of our country.

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): I just wish to say, as one of the Members for Birmingham, that I am always most anxious to look into any hardships or grievances under which workpeople suffer if they are brought to my notice, and to bring such redress as I have in my power. I think the attack the hon. Gentleman made on us poor Birmingham Members was hardly called for.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Durham, Mid) said that if the hon. Member who had just spoken had not seen reports of the cases in Birmingham which his hon. friend had referred to, it was his own fault. If he represented penmakers in Birmingham, it was his place to see that these cases were inquired into without waiting for some one from the north of England to give him enlightenment. He would like to refer to what the hon. Member for Battersea said as to the fear of foreign competition, because it was a matter which the representatives both of capital and labour should have some regard for. If there was one thing more than another which would enable this country to keep its place in industrial competition with other nations, it was the stamina and energy of its workpeople. It would pay employers to have more regard to cultivating and fostering the strength of the people they engage instead of having regard entirely to the monetary aspect of trade. He was glad to say that where men and women were fully organised in this country, the Truck Act was not put in force so rigorously as where they were unorganised. He preached conciliation and kindness between employers and workmen, and what he would impress upon employers was that where people were not organised and had no effective strength behind them, they should look to the morality of the matter and not impose these fines. It was necessary, before they could fully appreciate the circumstances of the poor workpeople of this country, that they should have tasted the bitter experience many of them had to go through. He had brought before the attention of the Home Secretary the bravery of some miners in a colliery in the county of Durham in the month of February. They risked their lives to save two of their fellows, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not possible to arrange for an industrial Victoria Cross to be awarded in such cases. He would be the last man to disparage in any way the bravery of any soldier or sailor, but there were as brave acts done in the mines, forges, and factories day after day as on the battlefield. The right hon. Gentleman replied that there was the Albert medal, and he had done something towards getting it for the three men in the case referred to. But the Albert medal was not a national recognition. It was awarded by a philanthropic institution, and what he wanted to see was the creation of some national recognition which would be given to those who performed brave acts in industrial pursuits. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to insinuate that the granting of medals to men who had risked their lives would give rise to difficulties and heartburnings. There were no such difficulties when the Victoria Cross was awarded for bravery on the field of battle, and in the industrial world the only heartburnings would be those of emulation and desire to achieve the same reward and recognition. Turning to another matter, he spoke in behalf of a number of coroners when he said there was a general desire that jurymen should be relieved from the duty of viewing the bodies of men killed by accident in collieries and other places, where there was no doubt as to the cause of death. He addressed a question some time ago to the Home Secretary on this subject, but he wished the right hon. Gentleman now to give a fuller answer than on that occasion. He wished to know whether anything could be done in the way of altering the law so as to render it unnecessary for jurymen to view the bodies in such cases.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, S.), who was very imperfectly heard, said it must be apparent to everybody who had listened to that debate that it had been conducted not only with unusual mildness of criticism, but also, as regarded the administrative action of the Home Office during the past twelve months, with something very like unanimity of approval. That was a circumstance on which he ventured to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman, because anyone who had had any experience, however small, of the work of the Home Office had found it less common to hear expressions of gratitude for what had been done than criticism for what had been left undone. He entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University that it was a subject of very great regret that the legislative proposals which the right hon. Gentleman had made had not been brought to a Second Reading discussion, as that would have had the effect of clearing the air, and of paving the way for a measure which many Members, at any rate, would regard as more comprehensive and less objectionable than that which was now on the Table of the House. The only matters upon which he wished to make a few observations were those raised in reference to various branches of dangerous trades, the first being that of lead poisoning. He thought, forming the best judgment he could on the materials now before them, that it was only fair to acknowledge that as a result of the changes which had been introduced by means of special rules and otherwise, there had been a substantial improvement in regard to the matter of lead poisoning. Unless the figures were altogether fallacious, he thought that was practically demonstrated by the official Returns. But, while they welcomed this improvement so far as it went, it was not one on which they could congratulate themselves so long as there existed the state of facts disclosed by his right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean and his hon. friend the Member for Battersea in the figures they had quoted to the Committee. If those figures, the accuracy of which there was no reason to impeach, represented the actual state of things, even after the amelioration which they believed had been introduced by the changes made in the administration of the law, they were still confronted with an appalling problem in the existence of what they now knew, on medical and scientific authority, to be preventable evils, and which were yet allowed to work this terrible destruction to life and health practically unchecked. He was very glad that on that subject there had not been in the course of the debate a single dissentient voice, unless it was that which proceeded from the hon. Member for Stoke. The hon. Member for Stoke seemed to have very peculiar ideas as to responsibility, and to think that his hon. friends ought not to have criticised the action of a particular stipendiary, because he (Mr. Asquith) when in office had appointed him. And the hon. Member seemed to think, too, that he ought to be held responsible for all the things which were said, in his absence, in his wife's drawing-room. Those notions of responsibility which the hon. Member apparently professed——

MR. COGHILL said he based his remarks on the reports which appeared in the newspapers. It was not a private meeting.

MR. ASQUITH agreed it was not a private meeting, but he was not there. So far as he could judge from the reports, however, it appeared to him that the speeches made were temperate, wise, and practical, and, as his hon. friend the Member for Battersea had said, so far as they were heard by those present and read by those absent, calculated to do a great deal of good. But, the hon. Member having these somewhat singular notions of responsibility, he did not attach quite the same importance he might otherwise have done to the sentiments he, and he alone, had expressed. He thought the figures quoted from Dr. Prendergast, and the state of things those figures disclosed, led to two irresistible conclusions. The first was that the existing code of special rules, excellent, no doubt, as an instalment in the direction of reform, was not sufficiently stringent to effect the purpose which the Home Office had in view. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary entirely agreed with him in that. He knew the difficulty there was in the necessity of submitting all these matters to arbitration, but, for his part, he was certain that if he were in the right hon. Gentleman's place, he would be prepared to undertake the possible delay, expense, and worry even of a fresh series of arbitrations until he had got these rules into a condition more adeqaate to the necessities of the case, and until—backed up as he was certain the Home Secretary under these circumstances would be by the public opinion not only of the district but of the country at large—he had got behind those rules, for the purpose of enforcing them, something which was really more valuable than the most vigilant activity of the most competent inspector—a well-informed and awakened public conscience. This was the first point they ought to press upon, he was sure, a by no means unwilling Home Secretary. The second was as to inspection. As he said last year, in his opinion a case had been made out, as regarded the particular instance of Staffordshire, where the pottery industry was mainly carried on, for the appointment not of a peripatetic or itinerant, but of a permanent female inspector, a lady who would do, not as the ordinary inspector did—namely, descend from time to time on the district to see what was going on, but one who would be living among the people, accessible to the workers themselves, and able day by day to make her influence felt by constant and vigilant visitation of all the factories and workshops concerned. There was no industry in the country, he believed, in regard to which it was more necessary to have a female inspector constantly on the spot than this one. The workers were, to an enormously preponderating extent, women and young persons; and they had only to listen to the terrible statistics which had been given to the Committee that day to see what a peculiarly deleterious effect this industry had upon women, and particularly in regard to child-bearing and the offspring they produced. If these two things were done—namely, the rules brought up in point of stringency to the view not of enthusiasts or of hysteria-mongers, but of grave scientific authorities, who had declared such stringent rules to be both practicable and necessary, and a permanent woman inspector appointed to see that they were properly carried out, he could not help thinking that before they were five years older this terrible plague spot would be removed from their midst. His hon. friend the Member for Berwickshire had referred to the fact that though the Departmental Committee over which he presided for so many years with such an enormous amount of assiduity and attention had advised the Home Office to form special rules for no fewer than seventy-eight industries, in only two cases had any effective steps yet been taken to carry out their suggestions. The right hon. Gentleman might have good reasons for the delay or apparent indifference of his Department, but he was sure the Committee would be glad to know what those reasons were, and, if the obstacles were of a removable kind, what steps the Department were taking to remove them and bring these industries also within the safeguards and protection they so urgently needed. On the general administration of the Department on its industrial side he had a peculiar interest and pleasure in the readjustments the right hon. Gentleman had had it in his power to make during the last twelve months as regarded the functions of the staff and other matters. He earnestly hoped he would be able to impress on the Treasury with increasing emphasis and effect the fact—which he believed was absolutely indisputable in view of the enormous and growing complexity of our industrial legislation, and the largely increased and legitimate interest public opinion now took in seeing that in industries where sources of danger existed those dangers should be obviated or at any rate mitigated—that there was an absolute necessity for providing a much more adequate staff than the Department at present possessed.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool) said he was exceedingly glad that the criticisms passed on the Department had, on the whole, been so favourable, and, above all, that the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories, embodying Reports of the other inspectors, had been received with such general satisfaction—Reports which reflected very great credit on the officials concerned. To have Reports containing so much valuable material, not only from the Chief Inspector, the women inspectors and others, but also from the medical and engineering inspectors, was a matter of considerable satisfaction. To deal with the questions addressed to him, he might say, first of all, that the hon. Member for Mid Durham was mistaken in supposing that the Albert medal was a private award, or given by private persons. The medal was really the industrial or civil equivalent of the Victoria Cross. He had had the pleasure of recommending in one or two instances that the Albert medal should be given for deeds of great gallantry. Those who had ever been responsible for granting the decoration would agree that in the case of the mining industry, in many of the accidents which unfortunately happened, it would be exceedingly difficult to select, among the numerous, almost universal, instances of brave conduct, the men to whom these medals should be awarded. He feared that very often when such a medal was given there were some heartburnings on the part of the friends, at all events, of some of the other men who had shown conspicuous bravery. The Albert medal was a national medal in the highest sense of the word, and was given for the most distinguished bravery, and it had always been acknowledged to take the place of the Victoria Cross among the civil population. As regards the question of the obligation upon coroners' juries to view the dead bodies, he was aware that it aroused considerable interest and that there was some feeling in favour of relief from this obligation. He was disposed to take this view himself; but when an attempt was made recently to obtain the opinion of coroners generally on the point, it was found that they differed widely amongst themselves both as to the desirability of any change in the law and as to the nature of the change, if any, which should be made. In these circumstances legislation was scarcely possible. With reference to the criticisms which had been made upon the administration of the Factory Law, he would take first that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean—namely, as regards lead-poisoning in the earthenware manufactories in the Potteries. He must say that he considered that the improvement had been steady and substantial, though he was free to admit that it had not been all that they could wish. Whether the figures of Dr. Prendergast were good or bad—and it ought to be explained that those figures did not relate to the present time, but to a period prior to the establishment of the Special Rules, and further did not, as he understood, represent only cases actually dealt with by the doctor himself—the fact remained that lead poisoning in the Potteries was a fearful thing, far more serious indeed, even in lucifer match-making, than phosphorus poisoning. He was, therefore, prepared to admit that the case demanded the most urgent attention on the part of the Home Office, in order that everything possible should be done to secure that the industry should be carried on in a manner as little harmful as possible to those engaged in it. They had not been altogether idle in this matter. He admitted to the full that the existing code of rules was not sufficient, but it had done a considerable amount of good. They had been engaged on a new code of rules, which would shortly be published, and which, he hoped, would carry out everything recommended by Dr. Oliver and Dr. Thorpe, with the exception that there was no absolute prohibition of the use of raw lead in every case. The Report would show how they had gone to work. In certain processes none but fritted lead was to be used, and that fritted lead was to be of a certain standard. In other cases, where raw lead was used, it was made incumbent on the manufacturers to show absolute necessity, and very special restrictions would be imposed. He had every hope that the rules would be accepted, and he was almost confident that they would get them without arbitration; but he should go to arbitration rather than that the present state of things should continue. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of inspection and especially as to women inspectors. He could not say too much for the good work done by the women inspectors all over the country. An Inter-departmental Committee on the constitution of the Factory Department had recommended certain increases of staff, including the appointment of one additional woman inspector, and that had been made. The right hon. Gentleman said that there should be one woman inspector resident in the Potteries for some considerable time. There was a great deal to be said on both sides. They were at present, in London, trying the experiment of putting the work in certain cases, e.g., laundries, under one woman inspector; and though he did not know whether he would be well-advised to extend that experiment, he acknowledged, at all events, to the full the principle that there were circumstances where girls and women would confide to a woman inspector what they would not tell to a man. To return for a moment to lead, he and his Department were fully alive to the necessity of doing all they could, and he believed it would be found that in the new code of rules—over which he had been spending much time, with the view to avoiding arbitration—a great step had been taken to make this industry less dangerous to those employed in it.

*MR. TENNANT: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when these rules will be published?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY could not say exactly, but it would not be very long. He thought he must add this for the manufacturers—in which connection he thought the hon. Member for Stoke had been somewhat harshly treated—that he had found them ready to take advice and to act with the Home Office; and he hoped that it was not a reproach to try to carry them with the Department rather than to impose fresh rules upon them very much against the grain. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for Berwick, he was perfectly sensible of the good work he and his Committee did for four years; and if the Home Office had not issued a great many special rules recommended by that Committee it did not follow that the work had been wasted or the recommendations ignored. That was especially the case in regard to the Bessemer and certain other processes, where the inspectors in the course of administering the existing provisions of the law were much helped by the Reports of the Committee. With some questions, of course, it was not possible to deal effectively without some such powers as were included in the Bill, which, as had been stated, had not had a Second Reading debate—a debate in which many misunderstandings would have been cleared up, and much help given in all probability to those responsible for that attempt at legislation. In reference to the phosphorus special rules, which had already been debated that session, he was very much astonished to find that so many Members took the view that the new rules had really not been strengthened by arbitration. There were even in comparison with the old rules one or two points in which they were weakened, it was true, contrary to the desire of the Home Office. But he claimed for them that in the first instance they were drawn in the main to carry out the recommendations of their experts. They were to a certain extent altered, but if those alterations were minutely examined they would be found not to have really that importance which was attached to them by some hon. Members. He did not know that he needed to go into them in detail, but taking, for instance, the distinction between the wet and the dry processes he could not say they were in a position to assert that they had the same positive evidence in regard to the injury in the one case that they had in the other. He was not prepared to admit, indeed, either that the rules were materially weakened, or that they were not a considerable improvement upon the rules passed some years ago. It had been said that the use of white or yellow phosphorus should have been prohibited; but he did not see how it was possible to insist upon the prohibition absolutely of the use of this particular kind of phosphorus. Moreover, he might mention that as a result of what had been done there had only been one reported case of necrosis during the past six months, which showed, he thought, that the Department had, to a large extent, got hold of the disease. In the next place the effect of the attention which the manufacturers were compelled to give to the matter by the new rules was that one large firm was known to have abandoned altogether the use of dangerous phosphorus, and that was a very satisfactory state of things; and if it was possible to supply strike-anywhere matches as cheaply as before without the use of this dangerous phosphorus the public could do a great deal in encouraging its disuse. Some allusion had been made to an international agreement with the idea of doing away with the use of white or yellow phosphorus, and of preventing the importation and exportation of matches in the manufacture of which white or yellow phosphorus was used. He feared that there was not much hope of such an agreement, for those acquainted with the trade knew that they had everything to lose and nothing to gain by such an international arrangement, and he was afraid it was no use trying to find a solution of the difficulty in that direction. Without going so far afield he hoped those hon. Gentlemen who had criticised the rules so closely would give them the opportunity of being tested by experience. He had every expectation of getting them established in all the places where matches were made, and if there should be a loophole in them he felt, from the support they had received in dealing with these matters, that there would be no difficulty in taking any further action which should be deemed necessary. His right hon. friend the Member for the University of Oxford had brought forward the question of the fruit trade. His right hon. friend said that there were a great many things going on in the jam factories which ought not to go on, and he attributed them to the administration of the Home Office. He thought that was very unfair, on the face of it, because it was owing to the state of the law that these things were going on, and not to the administration. By the law those jam factories were totally exempted from the Factory Acts at certain times of the year. The view of the Government was that whereas it was desirable to allow overtime to be worked occasionally, under proper conditions, when required, e.g., for the preservation of material such as over-ripe fruit, it was necessary to bring them under the Act for all other purposes, sanitary and otherwise; and he need hardly say that he would have taken care that the regulations which the Factories Bill would have enabled him to make applied to the whole of the factory, and not to any detached portion. The present state of the law with reference to these factories was not satisfactory, and they ought to be brought under the Act for sanitary and many other purposes; but, at the same time, there ought to be, within certain limits, powers for extended overtime, so that there should not be a great loss of perishable articles of food. The right hon. Baronet opposite spoke about the creameries in Ireland. He had had a very large and influential deputation from Ireland before him upon this subject before the Factories Bill was introduced. That deputation represented opinions on both sides of the House, and the members of it pointed out the enormous increase of these creameries in various parts of Ireland, and they also urged that they were not in a position to apply all the modern methods of preserving cream. That deputation argued that it was absolutely indispensable to their business that for about four hours on a Sunday the women should be employed to churn cream. He thought they made out a case at all events for careful consideration, and he proposed to take power to give effect to their representations because he thought the effect of enforcing strictly the existing restrictions would be to stop the employment of women altogether, and that would inflict an injury upon a struggling—he would rather say a growing and desirable—Irish industry. He agreed with his right hon. friend that it was most desirable to give no encouragement to Sunday labour; but there were a great many people who made butter on Sundays, and under special circumstances it was not unreasonable to say that for a certain space of time and at certain periods of the year the difficulties of dealing with those perishable goods should be considered and dealt with under proper restrictions. He was not sure that there was anything else to which he needed to reply. He might say, however, that he was simply astonished at the speech made by the hon. Member for Stockton. The hon. Member had always taken a most extraordinary view of the Truck Act of 1896, which was not warranted by a single word in it. The hon. Member had cited several very hard cases, but they were not the fault of the Truck Act of 1896, or any other Truck Act. The Act was introduced to place certain restrictions upon employers, and it was provided that certain acts should be illegal, viz., the imposition of fines and deductions from wages unless they were reasonable. All he had to say was that some of the women inspectors could tell the hon. Member that many very poor working people who before the passing of the Act could not help themselves at all, and had been imposed upon by greedy and dishonest employers, were now provided with a remedy under the Act of 1896. That Act passed through this House as a non-party measure, and the construction which the hon. Member for Stockton had put upon it was totally wrong and perverse. The hon. Gentleman had asked him why he had not granted certain exemptions from the Act under Section 9. The answer was that to grant an exemption is to remove the protection of the Act from the person or trade exempted. The Section provided that the Secretary of State could do this only when he was satisfied that the Act was not necessary for the protection of the persons engaged in any trade; and in order to be so satisfied he naturally demanded the joint assurance of employers and employed. The hon. Member said that only one exemption had been granted. He was right; and the reason was that in only one case had the necessary conditions been fulfilled.

*MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: But there was also the case of the North of England Board of Arbitration. Both employers and employed sent a deputation to wait upon you, and asked for those exemptions, and you declined to give them.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY said he declined because he was not satisfied that the deputation was thoroughly representative of all the parties, and had shown the Act to be unnecessary.

*MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: They represented both parties.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY thought he did not need to detain the Committee any longer. He had given hon. Gentlemen opposite the best answer he could, and he was quite aware that he could never convince them.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very excellent promise as regards the future. Perhaps some of my friends may think, under these circumstances, that I ought not to press my motion to a division. I can only say that, personally, I am so dissatisfied with what has happened that I propose to press my motion to a division as an expression of dissatisfaction with the administration of the Home Office in the past. If the right hon. Gentleman keeps all those promises he has made I may have the pleasure of supporting him in the future.

*MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): There is one question mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman to which I desire to allude, and it is a question in which the East End of London is concerned—I allude to the manufacture of lucifer matches, in the manufacture of which phosphorus is used. I do not propose to travel over ground which has already been covered, but I do desire to say that, in my opinion, the new amended rules which have been issued as the result of the arbitration are very unsatisfactory. There are one or two points in reference to them to which I desire respectfully to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. In the first place, I wish to allude to the employment of children without previous medical examination in the match trade. It is admitted that this is a dangerous occupation, and it is a notorious fact that some persons are much more susceptible to injury than others, and yet there is no provision that before a person enters upon this very dangerous occupation there shall be an examination of any kind, either medical or dental. The rules are complied with if there is an examination within twenty-eight days. The advocate who appeared before the arbitrator for the workmen strongly insisted that the order of proceeding was strangely inverted and that as these were dangerous occupations, it was only reasonable that the medical examination should precede actual employment. Upon the other side, on the part of the employers it was said that this was impracticable because persons were taken on early in the morning, and at other times and under circumstances which rendered it impracticable for a medical examination to precede employment. I do not desire to enter into a discussion as to whether or not any absolute rule that examination should precede employment is or is not under the circumstances impracticable, but I do submit to the right hon. Gentleman that twenty-eight days is an unreasonable period to permit to elapse before either a medical or a dental examination takes place, and I think ten or fourteen days would be quite sufficient. The second point to which I desire to call attention is with regard to the conditions after the occupation has been entered upon. It is admitted that some of the operations are very dangerous while others are less dangerous, and that some are altogether innocuous. In these circumstances it does seem reasonable that provision should be made for a change of occupation, and I think in this respect that we might learn something from the system in other countries. The law of Sweden provides—

"That no worker may be employed for more than six months at a time in dipping."

The law of Austria enacts—

"That workers shall from time to time be allowed a change of work."

A similar rule in our own country was recommended by the expert adviser of the Home Office, Dr. Oliver, who said that there should be a change of occupation for the workers, and that men and women should not be allowed to remain more than a few weeks at a time in any one department. That was the recommendation of Dr. Oliver, the professional adviser of the Home Office. Dr. Oliver refers to the case of adult men and women, but the argument is very much stronger in the case of mere children employed in these operations. I do not mean children within the technical meaning of the Act, but those persons who are in point of years really children. There is a general provision that young persons under the age of fourteen years shall not be fully employed in factories of this kind, but to that general rule there is an exception to this effect, that a child of thirteen who passes a prescribed examination may be employed for certain purposes in a match factory as a young person, and may be fully employed. I think it is very unreasonable that a child of thirteen should be fully employed in some of the most dangerous operations in connection with this trade, and may I point out that the medical adviser of the Home Office says that at the age of thirteen, or thereabouts, there is a peculiar danger from this kind of employment, because he says that, from a dental point of view, a child at the age of thirteen is more likely to be suffering from decayed teeth than in later years. And yet a child may be employed at this age without undergoing any medical or dental examination. This is an important matter, because, in the Report of the adviser of the Home Office with reference to a large London firm, I find it is stated that these children are constantly employed in these most dangerous processes, and are exposed day after day to the poisonous fumes. These children are of the age of thirteen years, and I say that it is an unreasonable thing that the rules should be such as to allow a child of the tender age of thirteen years to be permanently employed in an occupation which is professedly so dangerous as the dipping operation where phosphorus is used. I have ventured to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of these children, and I trust he will give it his careful consideration, and I am sure his natural disposition is fully in sympathy with the appeal I have ventured to address to him.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I have listened carefully to the reply made by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and it seems to me that he has failed to appreciate what is the real objection we take to the Truck Act. He said, and said very truly, that it was a non-party measure, and he said that the Truck Act was a Bill which he found at the Home Office, and which had been left there by his predecessor. The right hon. Gentleman also states that as the Bill was introduced it met with cordial approval, and that the Bill passed its Second Reading in this House without a division, and it was approved of in speech after speech delivered from this side of the House. But if the Bill had passed in the form in which it was originally introduced we should have had no complaint to make against it; because, as originally introduced, no fine or deduction could be made from a workman's wages unless his assent had been given in writing. That was the form in which the Bill was introduced to this House, and we approved of it because we felt it was a reasonable thing that a workman should be heard in his own interest as to what was considered a reasonable deduction in his wages, and as long as he had the right of being heard he had no complaint to make. That was the form in which the Bill was introduced, but what happened in Grand Committee? An Amendment was moved, I believe, by the hon. Member for Renfrewshire——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the progress of any particular Bill for which the Secretary of State for the Home Department is not responsible. Such a question cannot be discussed in Committee of Supply.

MR. FENWICK: I do not want to discuss that Bill, but I simply wish to state what led to our opposition to the Truck Act—namely, that the Bill as originally introduced did not actually become law, because the Home Secretary was defeated in the Grand Committee by an Amendment which deprived the workman of any right to say whether the contract made was reasonable or not. That is all I wish to say in reference to this point, for that Amendment completely altered the character of the Bill, and that has been the ground of our objection to the operation of the Truck Act ever since it became law. I only wish now to say that personally I was very pleased—and I think there are many people outside this House who will also be pleased—to hear the statement that was made by the Home Secretary to-night, in reply to the appeal made by the hon. Member for Mid Durham, in regard to the Albert medal. I was very pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that the Albert medal might be taken as an equivalent to the Victoria Cross. It is a surprising thing to me, and to many who take an interest in industrial affairs, how seldom this medal for meritorious conduct has been given to the men who have risked their lives again and again in order to save the lives of their fellows. I venture to say that if the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to grant a Return on the motion of any hon. Member of this House showing the number of cases in which the Albert medal has been given for meritorious conduct to the artizans of this country, it will be found that the number is very small indeed. And yet, having regard to the numerous cases in which explosions occur in mines, where the rescuing parties are subject to great hardships and exposed to great dangers and almost lose their lives in their attempt to rescue their fellows, I do not believe that there is a single case, even where a rescuing party have gone almost to the extreme length of losing their lives, in which the Albert medal has been granted. A remarkable case has been referred to in which the men exposed themselves to great danger, and one or two of them remained in an unconscious condition for a considerable time after, and yet all that could be got in a case like this was the medal of the Humane Society. If a man risks his life in saving a gun from the enemy on a field of battle he gets the Victoria Cross, but if you risk your life to save a fellow workman the probability is that you will get no reward at all for the bravery and heroism which you display. The difference in the case of the miner is this: he carries on his occupation far away from the public gaze, in the dark caverns of a mine. When a man goes out to rescue a person from drowning his heroism is seen, and it is emblazoned all over the country in the newspapers the following day. But in the dark caverns of the mines in this country you have similar deeds of bravery displayed, and there is no public recognition of those deeds. Of course you may say this is all sentiment, and I grant it; but, after all, human life is governed by sentiment, and at all events sentiment is something that tends to develop the spirit of emulation in regard to bravery in the minds of the industrial classes of this country. A man whose bravery is recognised is able to hand that token down to his family with pride and admiration, and it tends to develop that same spirit of bravery in his own family which we all desire so much to see cultivated. I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman may be in a position by-and-by to promise us that some recognition of deeds of bravery may be offered to miners when such deeds are discovered. I know there are great difficulties in the way, and the very fact that the miner carries on his calling far away from the public gaze increases the difficulty; but I think that the officials at the mine may be relied upon to say whether in their judgment any particular deed is worthy of recognition. I hope the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to introduce some token as a recognition of deeds of bravery when they are discovered, either in our coal mines or in our factories and workshops. If that could be done I feel sure that it would do a very great deal indeed in the direction of encouraging acts of bravery amongst the masses of this country.

Sir FORTESCUE FLANNERY rose to address the House, when Dr. TANNER called attention to the fact that forty Members were not present.

House counted, and forty Members being found present,

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, Shipley) said that the accusations of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean seemed more or less well founded as regarded lead poisoning, although he had not the technical knowledge necessary to judge between the right hon. Baronet and the Home Office. So far as the operations of the Home Office were concerned, there was no complaint to be made on the part of himself and his colleagues in their part of the country. In regard to the wool industry, an attempt had been made to grapple with the question. He did not say that that attempt was by any means complete, but when the representatives of the employers and employed combined together and agreed as to what form of rules should be adopted, the Home Office were at once desirous of putting those rules into practice. The results had been so far encouraging, though much less so than the friends of the workers had hoped. Further representations would probably have to be made in regard to certain details, but he had no doubt they would receive the same amount of consideration at the hands of the Home Secretary as those already made had received. For these reasons, he should not feel justified in supporting the motion of his right hon. friend the Member for Forest of Dean, although he had associated himself with him, and hoped again to have the honour, in pressing on the Government for further protection for those engaged in dangerous trades. He should like to say a word on the question raised by the hon. Member for Mid Durham as to an honourable reward being given for saving life. As much heroism was frequently exhibited in our mines, factories and railways, as by the most gallant soldier who had ever won the Victoria Cross on the field of battle. It was the general practice to grant exclusively to soldiers and sailors this valued token of recognition of gallantry, but it was denied as a recognition of the gallant acts performed by the workers of the country. One of the most graceful acts which could come from the present administration of the Home Office would be the putting on a clear and definite footing a system of rewarding these acts of gallantry by an industrial V.C.

*COLONEL BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) said the great bravery shown in rescue work by the mining population could not be exaggerated; but he thought that if a reward of a medal was instituted for such acts of heroism the conditions which attached to the military V.C. should not be followed. Lord Hardinge had objected to these conditions very much, for the Army. The V.C. was only granted for an act of individual valour, and not given to the whole of a party.

There were cases where, in a rescue from a mine, four or five persons were often equally deserving of recognition for the performance of a very dangerous action. He strongly recommended that the conditions of any such award should be fair to all concerned.

Question put.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): May I ask, Mr. Lowther, in the interests of propriety, whether you do not think it right in view of the character of the discussion which the hon. Member for Flintshire is about to open, to send a message to the Ladies' Gallery that it might be desirable that any ladies there should withdraw.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I will cause an intimation to be sent to the Ladies' Gallery.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I assure you, Mr. Lowther, that this is not a pleasant task on which I am about to embark. It is nothing but a painful sense of duty which impels me to do so, much against my own inclination. I think the Committee knows pretty well the subject to which I am about to call attention. I refer to the disgraceful condition of many of the streets of London at night time. I ask the House to consider what it is possible for us to do in order to clear our country of what has become a national reproach. Many hon. Members have travelled, as I have travelled, over most parts of the world, and they will bear me out in saying that in no country will you see such sights as are to be witnessed in this metropolis. The State has spent immense sums in primary education, and the children are much better educated than they were a generation ago; but I ask the House, what is the education they get on the streets of the metropolis when they leave school and reach that susceptible age when character is formed? The centre of the metropolis is given up to a carnival of vice every night, and I doubt whether in the whole civilised world such open and hideous manifestation of vice is to be seen as may be witnessed in Piccadilly, Regent's Circus, and the adjacent streets in the neighbourhood of Westminster. Let me read to the House a letter I have received from one much respected, whose name is widely known and honoured. I refer to Bishop Barry, whose church and rectory are in Piccadilly—

"I am anxious not to exaggerate, but it is difficult to speak too strongly as to the state of things which is there allowed to exist, especially between the hours of 11 p.m. and 2 a.m. The nefarious traffic in vice is carried on unblushingly by those who are well known to the police as prostitutes, or as living on the wages of prostitution. Solicitation, especially of the young, is openly practised, sometimes almost to violence. It is all but impossible to walk down Piccadilly at that time without molestation. Rows of cabs stand along the streets, to be hired for conveyance to immoral houses. At times there is open disorder of hustling, shouting, and rowdyism in general, mostly under the influence of strong drink. Formal complaint has to be made before this is sufficiently checked by the police. We feel the condition deeply, as a grievance and a scandal. We do not, of course, expect that sensual vice can be eradicated by action of law. But we do think that the constant and flagrant exhibition of vice in our streets, and the presentation of dangerous temptation to the inexperienced, ought to be prevented; and in this we only claim for the metropolis what is already secured in some of our largest provincial cities."

Mr. Samuel Smith.

Permit me to read another letter from a friend of mine who works among young men, and has exceptional opportunities of knowing the state of London—

"I understand that to-morrow evening you purpose to call the attention of the House of Commons to the way in which prostitution and solicitation is allowed to prevail in the streets of the metropolis. For sixteen years I have been engaged in work amongst young men in the centre of London, and I have come to the conclusion after a long experience that thousands of young men who yearly fall into immoral practices in the metropolis do so because the temptation meets them at every street corner. It is not once or twice in the course of a walk that a man is solicited for immoral practices, but the principal streets in the centre of London are thronged with fallen women, who in the present day seem to be allowed to carry on their vile business without any restraint whatever. That this is a growing evil is evident from the way in which it has developed in recent years. Ten years ago it was a very uncommon thing for a man to be solicited in the City itself during the daytime, but this is now a matter of frequent occurrence in Ludgate Hill, St. Paul's Churchyard, and Cheapside, while what I think is an equally marked evidence of the spread of this evil is the way in which our suburban roads are now used for the purposes of prostitution. I know from personal experience that even at a distance of eight miles from London, in a very quiet suburb, three or four women are constantly walking up and down in the neighbourhood of the station, soliciting men returning to their homes from business, and I am told that this is true not only in the west of London, but also in the north, while the way in which immorality is carried on on some of our railways at the present time is a scandal to which attention should be called. It is a well-known fact that the first-class carriages of the District Railway are at night constantly used in this way. As a citizen of London, I do feel that we have a right to demand that what has been done in Glasgow, Liverpool, and Manchester should be done in London, and that the streets should be cleared of this tremendous evil. There is, however, another aspect of this question which equally deserves attention, and that is the tremendous growth during the past ten years in the issue of publications in which pictures of an exceedingly indecent character are constantly to be found, and I also think that some attention should be given to the fact that the exhibition of grossly obscene pictures in business establishments can be carried on with impunity. I have myself appealed to a London magistrate on this question, and have shown to him copies of publications purchased for sixpence, each of which contained sixteen pictures of women in a nude condition, calculated to have an injurious effect on the minds of young men, and I was assured by the magistrate that as the law stood at present it was impossible to proceed. Trusting that your efforts may meet with much success, and that a blow may be struck at what is, I believe, England's greatest enemy."

I have also a letter from Mr. Hugh Price Hughes, of the West London Mission, from which I will read an extract:—

"From an exceptional knowledge of the social evil during the last thirty years, I have long realised that, while the vice itself can be removed only by moral and Christian influences, the deliberately organised trade in vice ought to be attacked by public authority. There is no doubt that in some respects the condition of our streets is growing worse, especially in consequence of the great increase of foreign tradesmen in vice, and foreign women. There is no difficulty whatever, owing to recent legislation, in dealing with disorderly houses and disorderly clubs when the local authorities are willing to do their duty. The special difficulty in West London arises mainly from two lamentable facts. First, that the existing law with respect to solicitation is so grossly unjust: solicitation by a woman is a crime, but solicitation by a man is no crime at all. Those of us who know the facts are aware that the great majority of fallen women are the victims of weakness, and hunger, and misplaced affection, and moral weakness; only a small minority are deliberately vicious. That these poor wretches alone should suffer, while their betrayers and tempters go scot-free, is outrageous. And many of us feel an almost insuperable difficulty in taking steps against the victim, while the principal offender is positively encouraged by the existing law. Secondly, Greater London is in the unhappy condition of having no control over its own police, so that when the local police make any mistake, as was illustrated in the Cass case, it becomes at once a question of party politics. You know how admirably the local authorities have dealt with this evil at Sheffield, Glasgow, and elsewhere; but there municipal government is not mixed up with Imperial party politics, and the best citizens of all shades of opinion give their moral support to the police, which alone makes police action safe and effective. . . . . There is one thing, however, that could be done at once, and it would have an immense effect. The ever-growing multitude of well known foreign women may be sent home. No foreigner has any right whatever to come to this country for the mere purpose of breaking the law and promoting vice."

I think those are very weighty indictments; they are perfectly accurate, and the evil is not confined to a few streets; it is spread over the whole metropolis, especially where there are theatres; and it infests the public parks, except those under the control of the county council, where far better order is maintained. I have travelled in many countries, but I have never seen such open incitements to vice as you see in London, and surely the time has come to attempt a reformation. Now I shall be asked at once, have we any means of successfully grappling with this question? We have examples of what has been done in our own country. I remember when Liverpool was in the same condition as London is to-day. There was no attempt to clear the streets. It was considered the proper thing to tolerate the evil, and the streets were almost impassable to respectable people. We formed a vigilance committee, and at last a large watch committee determined to see the law enforced. We got a bench of magistrates who were determined to back up the police, and in ten years the outward aspect of Liverpool has entirely changed. I do not say that the evil has been removed altogether, but what has been done makes a very great difference to young men who come into Liverpool to learn a trade, and the same thing has taken place in all our northern towns. In Glasgow so complete is the change that it is extremely difficult now to perceive any prostitutes at all. The evil is almost entirely banished. Now, I wrote to the chief constables in these towns: Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Sheffield, Cardiff, Edinburgh, and several others. But there are two towns where the change has been most remarkable, and I shall read to the House a few extracts from the letters of the chief constables of those towns and show how that change has been brought about. This is from the Chief Constable of Glasgow—

"Sir,—I am directed by the Lord Provost to forward to you returns showing the number of prostitutes apprehended during the last two years, in this city, for importuning passengers, and how they are disposed of. The Lord Provost has also asked me to explain to you the method adopted here in dealing with such cases, and I have pleasure in stating to you that we have no difficulty whatever in securing convictions against such offenders, as we are very well supported by the magistrates.

"Constables of experience, who know these females well, are sent out every evening in plain clothes to follow these females, and they have instructions to arrest and convey them to the office when they are observed importuning. The constables are enjoined to be exceedingly careful and not on any account to interfere with any female unless she is well known to them as a prostitute.

"The same constables have also instructions to watch for, and if possible detect, men molesting females.

"These plain clothes constables go on duty every evening at eight o'clock, and in the winter months constables are put along with detectives from 5 p.m. to watch offenders of the kind referred to.

"If there is any other information you desire I shall be pleased to let you have it."

I may say here that I am no party to any difference in the treatment of men in this matter. Well, that is the way in which Glasgow has effected the most extraordinary changes not only as regards this vice but others connected with it. They have suppressed indecent pictures and publications also. Cardiff is another notable instance of what can be done. In that town you have the most mixed, and I might say, perhaps, the roughest population of any town in England. It is, as we all know, a seafaring town and contains a considerable quantity of foreign sailors. Well, here is the letter of the head constable of Cardiff—

"In reply to your letter of the 17th inst. respecting disorderly houses, etc., I beg to inform you that the police of this town have for the past ten years energetically enforced the law, and have been fairly successful in suppressing immoral conduct in the streets. When a disorderly house comes under the notice of a constable steps are at once taken to have it watched, and when sufficient evidence has been obtained a warrant is issued and the offenders brought to justice. If a conviction follows, the owner or agent of the property is sent an official notice, and if a second conviction is obtained against the same tenant the owner or agent is prosecuted. We have had several cases of this kind against owners of disorderly houses with the most beneficial results, but, as you may imagine, it is difficult to hit the owner.

"Prostitutes plying their calling in the public streets are arrested by the police and dealt with under the Towns Police Clauses Act for importuning passengers.

"Prosecutions, however, do not always succeed in suppressing disorderly houses, as the following account will show.

"A certain district of the town was up to about two years ago a very hot-bed of vice and disorderly houses, and although prosecution followed prosecution it seemed impossible to rid the neighbourhood of objectionable characters, and the difficulty was the greater consequent on the district in question being in the centre of the town and in the midst of many licensed houses. These, as may be imagined, were frequented by the people of this district, and in many cases proved meeting places for them. It was then decided to adopt special police measures to purify the place. These measures consisted of placing on duty at each end of each street a uniformed police constable to observe each house and those who frequented it. The result was that in about a fortnight's time the occupiers vacated their houses, and within three months there was not a single disorderly house in the district. These houses are now tenanted by respectable working men.

"With regard to establishments carried on under the guise of massage, we have no houses of this description in Cardiff.

"The circulation of objectionable illustrated literature in Cardiff has been of rare occurrence, but whenever anything of the sort has been attempted prompt measures have been taken. Only recently indecent mutoscopic prints were seized, and ordered to be destroyed by the justices, and the offender was subsequently indicted at the Cardiff borough quarter sessions for misdemeanour and convicted.

"The only way to stamp out vice and crime of this character is by energetic police measures combined with a rigorous administration of the law, and even then, where the evil is deep rooted, it is difficult to suppress it."

Mr. Samuel Smith.

I might tell the House that I have had endless complaints of indecent mutoscopic exhibitions, but I am told the Mutoscopic Company is very careful of the views it sells. But I will give the House a sufficient idea as to how it is possible to support the law and remedy this evil if it is determined to do so. I am quite prepared to admit that London differs from other large cities, and the difficulty of dealing with it is much greater, but that is all the more reason why it should be dealt with. I believe it is still getting worse because the police force is not under local control, but is a quasi-military body under the Home Office. It follows that any unpopularity incurred by the police is at once reflected on the Government. I know that the present Home Secretary is most anxious to abate these evils, but he is fettered by the traditions of the office. But the police are part of the administrative machinery of the Government, and if they happen to make a mistake, as they did in the Miss Cass case, advantage is taken to assail the Government. The police make mistakes in all these towns I have referred to, but the broad backs of the municipalities are strong enough to bear that. The representatives of the people are not afraid. Supposing in a single instance a man was apprehended by mistake for stealing, would the law as to theft afterwards be disregarded and allowed to fall into abeyance? I believe so long as we have the police system as it is the police can only be used in a feeble and ineffective manner. What I would propose would be that the County Council should be authorised to employ a body of inspectors who should go in plain clothes, as in Glasgow, and be confined to dealing with this evil and related evils, such as vile pictures, illustrated papers, books, and advertisements. I believe this policy steadily pursued would make a revolution in the metropolis in a few years. We are aware of the risk that men so employed may be tempted by heavy bribes to shut their eyes to what is going on. This work can only be done by a highly-paid class of men. Then I insist that there should be no inequality of the law between men and women. There is a strong feeling in this country against any legislation which is directed against women which is not also applicable to men.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member that he must bring his remarks within the four corners of this Vote; he cannot suggest special legislation.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I will confine my remarks to the state of things as they exist. I have in my hand a letter from a lady who has spent all her life in the work of rescue, in which she says—

"Within the last three or four years I have myself been annoyed by being joined and spoken to (old as I am) in full early afternoon-light on the pavement by the Polytechnic. Another time, longer ago, I was waiting a few minutes for my husband in Lincoln's Inn Fields, he having gone into an office, and could scarcely get rid of the man who spoke to me. I hope one lady will tell you of a man coming up to her on a wet day, and getting his head under her umbrella and terrifying her.

"I do not hope even to make you realise how terrifying these experiences are to even mature women. When I was superintending a college for working women in London, in a northern square (evening classes) girls used to come in panting and upset by their experiences in coming for their desired teaching. They were hard-working girls who were trying to improve themselves after their day's work—not giddy people. In that same neighbourhood a bad man at one time made himself a general terror. But a brave solicitor tackled him and drove him off.

"A young lady doctor going home from a midwifery case was insolently joined by a man. Happily she saw a policeman and had the wit to tell the policeman that the man needed protection as he was so frightened of walking alone so late at night. The sarcasm rid her of the annoyance.

"I have twice been roughly spoken to by police when in the streets at night, once when looking for a girl who was lost, and once when helping a rescue-worker. This is only relative as showing that the police are prone to take the bad character of women who are out at night very easily for granted. Of course this ought not to be so. And I fear an increase of this tendency of mind. I hope that a story will be sent to you of a quite ideally quiet and good young lady, who helped her mother in a domestic emergency by taking a little brother out in a perambulator. She was joined by a man, and walked through square after square till she was quite exhausted in the endeavour to rid herself of his company without showing him where she lived.

"I also hope that you will hear details of a story of a girl sent by her mistress, during day-time, to the post office, spoken to by a man, followed home, written to. In this case the girl told her mistress, and the man was successfully made sorry for his evil conduct."

I have a large number of letters of that kind with which I will not trouble the House; but the House will feel that a very large number of pure respectable women are exposed to annoyance from men in a manner which is simply intolerable.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must connect the Home Office with his remarks. He must bear in mind that he is discussing the Home Office Vote, and that it is not possible to go into these questions unless he can connect them in some way with that Vote.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: The way I connect them is this: I say that the administration of the police with regard to these matters is very ineffective, and is it not in order to mention such evidence as I have to show it is ineffective?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I should have thought that that would have come upon the Police Vote. Had I known what the hon. Gentleman was not going to connect it with this Vote I should have ruled him out of order long ago. I thought that he was going to say that some action that the Home Office might have taken they had not taken, or that they had taken some action which they ought not to have taken.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: May I ask if the Home Secretary is not the responsible head of the London police? As I understand we are discussing a motion for the reduction of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The well-known rule is that you must raise a particular question on a particular Vote. I thought the hon. Gentleman was going to attack the Home Office in respect of some Acts which he apprehended were not properly enforced. He must in some way connect his argument with the administration of the Home Office.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I will ask whether I am in order in mentioning that the Home Office and the Home Secretary do not enforce Lord Campbell's Act as it ought to be enforced. The main portion of my argument goes to show that London is infested with low illustrated papers full of indecent pictures. These are largely circulated among school children. I cannot conceive of anything more fitted to debauch the minds of the young. It seems almost a mockery to talk about giving them religious education, and then allow this disgusting trash to be placed in their hands. I have personal experience, having examined it, of the printed rubbish, I cannot call it literature, which is circulated all over London, and I took the liberty of sending to the hon. Members of this House a copy of one paper full of these indecent pictures, and absolutely devoid of any moral sentiment from beginning to end. The point I wish to raise is, whether it is not possible for the Home Office to throw more vigour into the administration of the law, and whether it is not possible to put some check upon the villains who scour the picture galleries of Europe to collect the worst garbage and reproduce them in cheap forms for English circulation—the vile publishers who offer twenty-four of such pictures for 6d., and which are advertised in the cheap papers sold to boys and girls. Why is the law not enforced? I might remind the House that I carried through the House, twelve years ago, a resolution to this effect—

"That this House deplores the rapid spread of demoralising literature in this country, and is of opinion that the law against obscene publications and prints should be vigorously enforced, and, if necessary strengthened."

Let me tell the House what happened. After this resolution was passed there was no difficulty. It had a wonderful effect in quickening the action of the police authorities, and led to prosecutions all over Great Britain, and convictions were obtained with ease which could not be obtained before. An immense quantity of the rubbish was destroyed, and some of the chief offenders fled the country. That was a result of a vote of the House of Commons without any change in the law. Now I wish that upon this occasion we could have a similar expression of opinion. The law is strong enough, but I contend it is not put into force. It surprises me that London magistrates refuse to convict in such cases. The Home Secretary has seen some pictures which were brought before the Lord Mayor, and which he refused to proceed against. The silly argument is used that they are works of art. "Art" is used as a kind of charm. It reminds me of the way the Dublin Invincibles disguised the crime of murder by calling it "removal." They talked of "removing" Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, and seemed to think this took it out of the category of murder. So some sapient magistrates think that if you call the most lewd picture a work of art it becomes sacrosanct. There is a widespread opinion that the Ten Commandments do not apply to art or the drama. I do not think this House or the nation will endorse this opinion. There is one great firm which has been most particular as to the literature with which they dealt—Messrs. W. H. Smith and Sons; but I am sorry to say that of late years there has been laxity even there. It is a remarkable fact that in all matters of this kind it is public opinion which decides what the law shall be. The law should be made more rigid. Related to this trade in obscene pictures is the great abuse of mutoscopic or animated pictures. This wonderful discovery can be utilised to give rational and innocent entertainment, and usually is, but it is also used by ruffians to debauch the young. It is the custom now to take an empty shop into which these machines are put, and to put into the window suggestive or disgusting titles of the views, and then, in order to create notice, children are invited in to look at the machines, which contain pictures of semi-nude women, etc. In my constituency last year we discovered some "penny-in-the-slot" machines which exhibited grossly indecent pictures to boys and girls, and I had many letters complaining of this plague from seaside resorts. Now I am told that many parts of London are plagued with it. I have communicated with the Home Secretary again and again upon this subject. I have done my utmost to get accurate information, and I have made no statement which is not absolutely true. I find a great objection generally raised to prosecutions with regard to these pictures is that they are works of art. They are not works of art at all, but evil and obscene pictures. There is something now going on at Earl's Court Exhibition, where there are mutoscopic exhibitions in different parts of the grounds, and this is what is being shown. I quote from a reliable observer, who says—

"I visited the exhibition at Earl's Court on Friday, June 29th. Many 'animated pictures,' 'mutoscopic views,' or 'moving pictures' are on view there in various parts of the grounds and buildings, all exhibited by means of 'penny-in-the-slot machines.' The first set of machines I visited were advertised to contain 'mutoscopic' views, and a number were labelled with suggestive titles. I put a penny in one machine, and found that it contained a series of pictures of girls in short frocks engaged in kicking at a hat which was held above their heads, there being at each attempt a liberal display of underclothing. In another machine of this set, labelled 'The Spider and the Fly,' views were exhibited showing a woman in tights sitting in the centre of an imitation spider's web, and inviting a young man to come to her. He resists at first; but in the last view, rushes forward, evidently to embrace her. There were many other views with suggestive titles. One which I saw was called 'Mixed Bathing Allowed,' and represented women in scanty bathing costumes playing on the beach. I visited another set of machines not labelled 'mutoscopic.' I asked the name of the owner, and was told by the attendant that they were owned by Gordon and Co., whose address I found to be 3 and 4, Pond Place, W. These pictures were the worst I have seen. One set was entitled 'Behind the Scenes of a Paris Theatre,' and consisted of thirteen pictures, which I saw. All of these pictures were objectionable, and many were indecent. One was the picture of a perfectly nude female; another represented a girl undressing in a bedroom; a third a girl with nothing on but a thin undergarment; and many were pictures of the lowest kind of French dancers in indecent and suggestive attitudes. I may add that the attendants at many of these machines are girls."

It is entirely forgotten that children must be protected in a different way from grown persons. The same principle applies to public placards. Many of these are disgusting, and border on the line that would enable a prosecution to be successfully undertaken. To say the least, they are extremely vulgar and brutalising; they are continually feeding the mind of the young with evil suggestions; and they induce a coarse and animal view of life. These pictures remain indelibly photographed on the minds of the young. Why should the young not be protected? Why should city councils not have a discretionary authority to keep the streets, which are public thoroughfares, free from this moral poison? I do not think this House realises what a relief it would be to fathers and mothers if they knew that these debasing advertisements could be suppressed. I bring these evils before the House assured of the sympathy of the Home Secretary. I know that he wishes his hands to be strengthened by this House, and I feel sure that if it agrees to this resolution, an era of reform will set in which will be fruitful of good to the rising generation.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £96,207, be granted for the said Service." — (Mr. Samuel Smith.)

MR. SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire): I rise to support the motion of my hon. friend, and my excuse for doing so is the fact that for more than sixteen years I have been connected with work specially amongst young men, and that I have had the opportunity of learning the difficulties young men have, especially in the metropolis. It is especially on behalf of young men that I would plead with the Home Secretary. Let me say that neither my hon. friend nor any of us pretends that there is any possibility of preventing sin in the City of London. All that we ask is that the Home Office should make London just as good as other cities are. Some of us who have travelled know the cities of India intimately, and many of us have been in the cities of America, and in the cities on the Continent. I do not hesitate to say that there is no city in India, America, or on the Continent, or even in the provinces of this country that at all approaches to the condition of London. In London we see vice flaunting. Of course, hon. Members will perhaps say that in other countries it is thrust underground. That is perfectly and absolutely true; but from my point of view I think that there is very great danger in the open flaunting of vice. I came to London myself as a young man of seventeen, and let me say that there are many hon. Members here who have no conception of what the temptations of the people are. They go to preparatory schools in their childhood, they go to public schools in their boyhood, and as they get older they go to the university. In the preparatory school, the public school, and the university they are specially sheltered—although there are many other temptations—from this particular form of temptation. But a young man comes to London and goes into a shop or an office, and having the whole evening to himself he is expected to turn out as soon as the shutters are put up, and he is not expected home till supper time. He is looked upon as a trouble if he remains in the place of business or the home attached to it, during the evening hours. What place has he to go to except the streets? It has been very well said that the streets are the playground of the poor. I know the truth as regards a large number of the young men who come up from the provinces. Many of them escape the perils around them and become leading citizens in London, but many others—I am afraid a very considerable number of them—are absolutely ruined for time and eternity before they have been six months in the City of London. I know that temptations must abound; but I do think that the Home Secretary, if enabled by the strong opinion of the House of Commons to carry out that which I believe to be in his heart—could arrange that there should be less of this open temptation which so easily catches a young man when he first comes to the City of London. But I appeal to the Home Secretary not only on behalf of young men, but also of young women. I believe that if any Member will just go and stand in Regent Circus, Piccadilly Circus, Regent Street, or Piccadilly during the time that shops are closing, and when the milliners, shop girls, and dressmakers are going home, he will entirely understand my position and sympathise with what I say. He will see there girls who are working very hard, earning, perhaps, 10s. or 15s., or at the outside £1 a week, who are dressed very sparingly, and sometimes in very poor garments, jostled and thrust into the gutter by women in silks and satins. Can you wonder if girls in that position, if they contrast their position with the position of those others, should begin to consider whether after all it would not pay to become vicious like the rest? Not only is that true of that class of girls, but I think the condition of our streets is a great temptation to all the children of the poor. A working man cannot afford to dress his girls the way these women are dressed, and every woman is naturally fond of good clothing. When the daughters of our poor respectable working-men begin to wander in the streets, and to see how these women are able to dress, can you wonder if that also forms a very strong temptation to them; because, of course, these poor creatures do not see the whole story. They know nothing of the hospital, the awful disease, and the terrible death. All they see is the good apparel, and all they know of the life of the women walking the pavement is that their condition seems to be much better than their own. There is another reason why I should entreat the Home Office to do something. I know as a matter of fact that in many parts of London the condition of the streets—a condition which is tolerated by the Home Office—is reducing the value of property. I could take hon. Members to whole districts where rents have been reduced 20 and even 30 per cent., and in some places even more than that, and if you ask the house agents why the rents have been reduced they will tell you it is because these particular streets have become the haunts of prostitutes—not to a very great extent, but where a few girls cluster in the evening, perhaps a dozen at most. Yet that one fact has reduced the value of property to a considerable extent. I think these are considerations which ought to affect the mind of those who are in authority. Let me just say one word in conclusion. My hon. friend has spoken of foreign women who come to London. I know as a matter of fact that there is a very great deal more of that than anybody would conceive who had not studied the question. I will say more—I know as a matter of fact that the earnings of these women are not the earnings of their particular vile trade, but that they depend, and those who support them and brought them over depend, upon robbery and blackmail. There is far more of that going on in London than anybody has any conception of, and for the sake of our young men and young women, for the sake of the owners of property and those who desire to spend peaceful lives, and also for the sake of the protection of the citizens, I think the Home Office ought to strengthen itself in this matter, and make London a place fit to live in.

*Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY: I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. Gentleman who moved the reduction of my salary—for the very extraordinary reason that I am not able to control the morals of London—nor the earnestness of the hon. Gentleman who seconded the motion. I agree with the hon. Members that a great many of the things which are seen in London, advertisements and otherwise, are disgusting. But there is a very great difference between objectionable publications and objectionable exhibitions which come within the law, and those which are merely coarse, vulgar, and, if you like, degrading and demoralising, but which it is not possible at present to prosecute. It is, in these circumstances, rather hard that the Home Office or the police should be attacked, as they have been by the hon. Member who seconded the motion, for not having done more to keep more pure and free from abomination particular streets in London. I should be very glad to know any case in which either that hon. Gentleman or the hon. Member for Flintshire considers the police have failed to do their duty in the way of prosecutions.

MR. SOUTTAR: I referred to the Home Office in such a way as merely to keep myself within the ruling of the Chairman.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I am perfectly willing to take upon myself the responsibility for the police. Nobody who takes an interest in this question can be altogether pleased with a great many things to be seen in certain parts of London at certain times of the night; but I do not agree that, under the present condition of the law, or under any condition of the law that is likely to be sanctioned by Parliament, it is very easy to remedy that state of things. If you are to clear the streets of women who solicit you must have evidence to take the offenders before the magistrates; and, although the police, who walk about mostly in couples in order to avoid mistakes and charges of blackmail, make every effort to deal with the evil, the private persons who are subjected to annoyance are not, as a rule, willing to come forward, and without their evidence there is very little chance of obtaining convictions. I can assure hon. Gentlemen who take an interest in these matters that I have assured the police over and over again that they will receive every support from the Home Office in taking cases before the magistrates in which there is evidence that there has been a contravention of the law to the annoyance of any person in the street. The figures show that there has been an increase of these charges during the past few years, and an increase of convictions. But the hon. Gentleman spoke of the way the streets of Liverpool or Manchester had been reformed. Even if the law in these cities is the same as in London, that is not the case with Glasgow (also mentioned by the hon. Member), where there is a law which would not be tolerated in London. And in any case in Liverpool a great many persons interested in the state of the streets have banded themselves together, as I understand, and made it their business to bring cases before the magistrates to be dealt with, and that could be done also in London perhaps with the special co-operation of the vestries. To make the police the primary and main prosecutors in these cases is a dangerous thing, but I have instructed the police to give every assistance in their power to persons who bring such charges, and those who bring charges against persons breaking the law will have the entire support of the Home Office. I did not understand the hon. Member for Flintshire to make any charge against me for failing to support local authorities in the suppression of disorderly houses. I did not understand him to say that I could do more in that respect. The police have instructions to give every assistance that can be given to vestries and local authorities in the way of getting evidence for the suppression of disorderly houses. A great deal has been done in that direction in the past few years. For instance, the figures show that in 1898 in London there were 222 convictions in cases brought mainly through the action of the police. The hon. Member for Dumfriesshire referred to the case of those infamous persons who live upon the earnings of these unhappy women, but he failed to give the Home Office credit for the passing of an Act two years ago which so frightened many of these persons that, before it received the Royal Assent, they fled from the country. Moreover, during the two months or so of 1898 during which the Act was in operation there were in London alone thirty-nine prosecutions under it and thirty-three convictions, while last year there were about 200 charges and 130 convictions of such persons. The hon. Member for Flintshire referred to the exhibition of newspapers and photographs of a demoralising and degrading character, and I think there is a great deal of truth in what he says—namely, that much of what is going on in this respect must be shocking to any man or woman who has regard to the morality of the country. But, coarse as many of these publications are, they do not come within the limits of the law as far as I know; while with regard to the living pictures to which the hon. Gentleman has directed my attention there is not one in which, on the evidence which I have been able to get, there is a chance of obtaining a conviction. I do not think the police or myself can be blamed for not prosecuting. The hon. Gentleman sent me an illustrated publication this morning, and I assume that he thinks that paper could be prosecuted with success. I venture to say that no court of summary jurisdiction and no jury would declare the publication to be obscene. They are not very beautiful pictures, perhaps, that are reproduced therein, but I do not think the hon. Gentleman is quite right in setting up his own standard of what he considers immoral and obscene when he blames the authorities for not prosecuting papers of that kind. That is an instance he gave me of the kind of publication which ought to be prosecuted. I have done everything I could within the limits of the law both to protect the streets of London, keeping them as clear as possible of vice, and to give every assistance to local authorities to put down disorderly houses. I have done everything I could to instruct the Public Prosecutor to act where prosecutions could be entered upon with success, and I do not think any reason has been shown why I should depart from the course I have taken. I am most anxious to carry out the law as it stands, and I think that a good deal more could be done if more public feeling were exhibited in deprecation of a good deal that is published and done. But that is a very different thing from bringing new things within the criminal law. I can only assure the hon. Gentleman and his supporters that the police are not insensible of their duty in any respect, and as long as I hold my office I will do my best under advice to deal with that which can be taken notice of. After this assurance I hope the Committee will be content with the discussion which has taken place.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The hon. Member for Flintshire has done what he considers to be his duty in bringing before the House of Commons the condition of the streets of London as viewed by himself. I do not associate myself with the motive that has induced the hon. Gentleman to make the speech and to give the evidence to which we have listened to-night, but I will say this: I think it can be said of all of us, whether we are puritanical or religious, whether we are strait-laced or whether we look at life in a cavalier manner, that we are agreed as to the necessity of London being a clean, decent, healthy, but free city. We all want to save youth, both boys and girls, from contamination. But it is not only in the streets of London that boys and girls are contaminated. I have heard that, through evil influence and bad environment, schools which I need not name have done a great deal more to corrupt certain youths than ever poor boys have been corrupted in the slums of the East End of London. It is evident, also, that religion does not always mean a strict adherence to monogamic rules and a low illegitimate birth rate. I have known countries which were very religious, but whose illegitimate birth rate was disproportionately high. But without being a puritan and without desiring to restrict, I believe the hon. Member for Flintshire has made out a case for the law being more strictly enforced, and police administration being more sensibly and more vigilantly pushed forward. Given every latitude that ought to be given to freedom, to disciplined gaiety, to art, to literature, and to the rational enjoyment of a free people in their own way in a rich and large city, I think there is yet much to be done to prevent sheer animalism and brutality and bestiality protruding themselves as they have protruded themselves recently in very subtle forms in the West End of London. I, for instance, do not share the view of my hon. friend about prostitution. I believe that prostitution is economic, social, sometimes industrial, and so far as persons are concerned it is often purely physical. When economic conditions prevent marital relationship, as they often do, concubinage prevails, prostitution exists, and vice and sometimes bestiality follow. You cannot put down prostitution by pious opinion, by religious sentiment, or by calling upon the Home Secretary to send the police to suppress it. But at the same time, when that prostitution assumes the indecent phase it can be seen to assume in certain streets of London, prostitution in its objectionable form has got to be dealt with. I do not want to harry these poor women who ply their dreadful calling with most melancholy features as a rule, whose dress is disproportionately gay, as their real spirits are very low and drab in colour. I should be sorry to see detectives put to watch these people or to worry them in any way whatsoever; but, so far as it is possible to remove and reduce prostitution, I am in favour of it being done. Having said that, it is possible so to organise the public decency of streets as to give liberty, almost licence, and yet keep the young from being corrupted. I am a practical man and a Londoner, and I venture to say there is not an officer in Scotland Yard who knows more of the shady side of London than I do—a cockney lad, born and bred. But we have been able to purge the London parks of not always the poor ruffian, but frequently the well-dressed ruffian, who had sated his appetite in every other direction, and looked upon our London parks and playgrounds as a means to satisfy an appetite I need not refer to. We have done that in ten years—and how have we done it? I can remember the time when the parks of the Metropolitan Board of Works were as repulsive and as indecent as a superintendent of police told me, to his shame, the other night, in his opinion St. James's and Hyde Parks are at this very time. How have we done it? We have told our constables they are to do their best to protect the young against these men who molest them. It has been done, and the result is that every London mother can now look upon a London County Council park or open space not only as a playground, but, so to speak, as a moral sanctuary in which her young boys and girls can go and play unmolested. I do not want to give you all the details of how we have done it. Our constables, perhaps, were not too precise as to the spirit and the letter of the law; there were some councillors who, unlike the Home Office, did not hesitate to assist the constables in purging the parks and open spaces of this particular type of person. But there is the fact—those persons have been cleared out, and the parks are free of them. I believe that, by a similar vigorous application of the same conditions of service, the same result could to a great extent be secured in Hyde Park and in some of the streets. Now I come to a statement made by the hon. Member for Flintshire. He quoted Bishop Barry. I wish he had also quoted Bishop Barry's reference to the inefficient administration of the Home Office some two or three years ago, and that he had given the opinion of some of the local people that the police were not doing in that particular district everything they might do. But the hon. Member did not do so. I, however, will venture to say that in this respect the Home Secretary is not doing what he ought to do under the law. Why do I say that? I had the pleasure and honour of helping the late Attorney General one morning in 1898 in getting through a very small Act, which, like many small things, seems to have done a great deal of good. That was an amendment of the Vagrancy Act of 1824.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: My own Act.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I agree. I do not want to deny the right hon. Gentleman the authorship. So far as the authorship is concerned I will divide it equally between the late Attorney General and the Home Secretary. But what was the effect of that measure? Immediately after the Act was passed and put into force—within a week—400 French, Belgian, German, and other bullies left London by steamer and returned to the Continent. However charitable we may be to the women who are driven to prostitution from any cause, we have no right to be in any way sympathetic to the ruffians who live upon these women, who not only brutally ill-treat the women, but are also systematic criminals, and who, when they are not ill-treating the women, and living on the proceeds of their degradation, or consorting with thieves, are doing other and worse things. With that type of man we ought to have no sympathy whatever. But somehow or other, during the last two years, these people have returned. Owing to the laxity of the administration of that Act between 1898 and 1900 these men are coming back again, and if the right hon. Gentleman will go to Piccadilly Circus, Charles Street, Duke Street, and George Street—I will run him round myself with pleasure—he will see that some portions of Piccadilly are getting as bad as they used to be. I am not altogether concerned about the prostitute, as I said, but I am concerned in putting down the souteneur and the bully. I am also credibly informed that there is taking root in London a new form of vice, Eastern in its origin, and most animal and bestial in its character. This form of vice has got to be, and can be, stamped out in so far as it applies to the men, and it can be done under the terms of the Act to which I have referred. The right hon. Gentleman said he had not been directly censured by the hon. Member for Flintshire for negligence in these matters. I will have the boldness to say that if the Home Secretary wants to make London decent he should carry out the suggestion I will make to him. Let him transfer the East End superintendents at once for two years from the East End of London, where these things do not prevail, to the

A, B, C, D and E divisions; let them come over with their East London ideas of morality and public decency and enforce in the West End what they daily and nightly do in the East End, and he will find that much of the objectionable things the hon. Member for Flintshire has mentioned will disappear. Now, I will come a little closer to the right hon. Gentleman. He wants to know how these things can be stopped. I will make a practical suggestion. He admits that blackmailing is increasing. So it is.

*Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY: I did not say so.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: I think that if the right hon. Gentleman asks Sir Edward Bradford he will be told that that is the case, and the right hon. Gentleman's own Report as to the convictions under the Vagrancy Act will also prove it. The Home Secretary says he is quite willing to do anything he can to check this evil without interfering with the freedom, the gaiety, and the happiness of this big city. Here is my suggestion. Notwithstanding the fact that they do not always do everything they should, I believe that the Metropolitan Police, after the City Police, are the best police force in the world. I ought to know something about that, as I have come into closer contact with them than any other Member of the House. I let it go at that. After the City Police—who are better paid, are under municipal control, are under a Watch Committee, and the chief of whom is in daily contact with the citizens on the Watch Committee—the Metropolitan Police are the best in the world. But they are not good enough in this respect. In their own journal, the Police Review, you find evidence of things being done by the police which, say what you like, do undermine vigilance, destroy probity, and affect impartiality. If the Home Secretary wants to clear the West End of London of these evils he has got to render it impossible for 1,171 policemen to be compelled to live on a net weekly wage of 21s. 10d. per week. You have no right to ask a young policeman, six feet in height, to live in the neighbourhood of Piccadilly on such a wage. When there are souteneurs, bullies, restaurant and club proprietors, and brothel keepers around him night and day, it is too low a wage. There are 4,366 constables, both married and single, in London getting the miserable wage of 28s. and under per week. If the Home Secretary thinks he can get a man on point duty in Piccadilly Circus from eleven o'clock at night until two o'clock in the morning to walk the straight path of duty, integrity, and probity, on 21s. 10d. per week, out of which he has probably a wife and two children to keep, he is asking too much from a policeman whose lot ordinarily is not a happy one. He should make it a rule that no man employed in the West End district of London should have less than 30s. a week as a minimum, while the special point duty men—and this would not apply to more than 1,000 men—in the A, B, C, D, and E divisions should have not less than 35s. Why do I say 35s.? Because it is well known in the force that married men always make the best policemen. There is a reason for it; we do not want to discuss it. I would always prefer to have married men for this class of work. If the right hon. Gentleman would give these men a minimum wage of 35s. or 30s. plus a lodging allowance, which the men have a right to claim, I am positively convinced that many of the things to which the hon. Gentleman has objected would be removed by mere administrative improvement and efficiency. The right hon. Gentleman may ask me what reason I have for suggesting any increase of wage. Looking at his Report this year, I find 2,000 constables out of 13,000 were reported and punished; 349 were reduced in pay to the extent of from 2s. to 8s. weekly; and 131 were dismissed the force. I want to know why those 2,000 men were reported and punished.

*The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member is rather anticipating the Vote for the Police Force.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: It is exceedingly difficult for me, having been asked by the Home Secretary to give direct instances, to keep within the strict technical ruling, and I should personally be very much obliged if you would allow me to reply to the right hon. Gentleman. I see no other way of doing it.

*Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY was understood to say he had not made such a request; all he had said was that he was prepared to support the police in carrying out the law.

MR. JOHN BURNS: My answer to that is, that the only way you can have the law carried out efficiently is to put these constables in the position I have indicated. I am quoting these instances in which the law has been broken, and I want to know what breach of the law it was that caused the right hon. Gentleman to dismiss 131 policemen last year.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think that is a matter of detail which must come upon the detailed Vote for the Metropolitan Police.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Then as I cannot enlarge upon this particular point, I should be driven to prove that the Vagrancy Act and nearly all the sixty Acts under which the Home Secretary administers the London police force are not so well enforced as they should be, simply because it is impossible for a London constable to be virtuous on 21s. 10d. per week. I now come to another point. I am not only concerned with the police in relation to vice and indecency; I have a complaint to make about the way in which the police law is evaded in regard to coffee-stalls at night-time. I am not talking of bona fide coffee-stalls, but of those innumerable coffee-stalls that are springing up, especially where prostitutes most do congregate, which give an excuse for disorderly people to gather, and which are a centre of rows, trouble, assaults, and so forth. If the police were better treated and better paid they would be able to deal with these conditions better than they now do. I have in my hand protests from the Lambeth Vestry, the Rotherhithe Vestry, and the Walworth Vestry, from a conference of local authorities held upon the condition of London streets at night time, and they all side with me in saying that if the police and the Home Secretary did their duty more vigilantly, many of the objectionable things we have witnessed could be abolished. My last point is strictly germane to the question. The Home Secretary must know that in the Police Review, which is filed and bound most religiously at the Home Office, and which is read by every member of the force, the best officers are saying there is a condition of things going on in regard to the Metropolitan Police Force that makes for dereliction of duty and brings about on the part of the police an obligation to the club proprietors, restaurant keepers, and publicans in the West End of London. What is that? It is the touting of tickets for the Metropolitan Police Orphanage, for police excursions, and many other things connected with the police. The practice is denounced by the men's own journal. I will tell you how it is done. A policeman is told off to go to a West End club, a restaurant, perhaps a brothel under the name of a club. He says to the proprietor, "Take £5 worth of tickets for our Metropolitan Police Orphanage, will you?" The proprietor, anxious to be on good terms with the police, takes the tickets, and what does he do? He says, "I do not want to go to this; you take the tickets back again." The tickets are taken back again, and there is the charge in the Police Review that tickets which have been paid for once are sold over and over again, and the men make money out of them. The effect of this is that the club proprietors, publicans, and brothel-keepers have indirectly the police under their control. Stop the police doing this kind of thing. If you do not stop it, the things the hon. Member for Flintshire has complained of will go on; the system will extend and deepen until we will have in London what you can see in the "Tenderloin" district of New York, where the chief inspector, when I was there five years ago, admitted making £10,000 a year by blackmailing the gambling hells and prostitutes in that district. Stop this practice; make it illegal; dismiss the first constable or officer found doing it in connection with the orphanage, cricket club, or anything else. If you do that, and raise the wages to 35s. a week, you will do a great deal towards purging the police force and removing many of the evils complained of. I have one other suggestion. Get rid of your four chief constables. You have four chief constables getting about £4,000 a year. You do not want them; they are superfluous; they interfere with the superintendents; they are unnecessary; they are mischievous. Get rid of them, and the money you save can be used for raising the wages of the constables. You should also see that your superintendents of police go about not in the plain clothes they now do. What is the chief merit of the superintendent of police in a provincial town? It is that everybody knows him; he is in uniform; and if a shopkeeper is molested in any way by roughs he goes straight up to the superintendent and says, "Put a man on here." We never see the superintendent of a division in London; he is either burying himself in musty documents in his office—which a fourth-rate constable could do—or he is riding about in a dogcart in civilian clothes, and nobody knows him. Let the superintendents walk about each of the thirty divisions of London, known to the people, accessible to every vestryman, guardian, and county councillor. If he brings himself into contact with the people great good will be done. As you, Sir, have decided that I cannot go further into the details of police administration; as I am not allowed to quote the numbers of the Police Review dated 28th July, 1899, May, and so forth, which confirm every statement I have made; as this is not the opportunity of giving detailed suggestions as to how Scotland Yard could be improved and the police force generally made more efficient, I will conclude by saying that you have got a good police force, but that force is being "militarised" too much. The best police force is a civilian force; I believe the best chief constables are lawyers who have the judicial mind and the civilian instinct——

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now clearly diverging from the Vote under discussion.

MR. JOHN BURNS: Very well, Sir. I will conclude by asking the right hon. Gentleman to pay deep attention to the suggestions I have made, and not to accept every puritanical suggestion of my hon. friend the Member for Flintshire. If the right hon. Gentleman is at all inclined to doubt any of my statements, and would like a personally conducted tour to prove every one of my assertions, I shall be delighted to oblige him. He may rely upon this, that the streets of London will never be as pure as they ought to be until my suggestion with regard to the minimum wage of the constable is carried out, so that he may not be so liable to the temptation to which too many succumb.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The hon. Member for Battersea has made a very serious charge against the London police force. Of course it is a charge I cannot accept, and I have no knowledge of its truth; but I will examine into the statements which have been made. Meanwhile I repudiate them most warmly.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire) thought those who lived in London and had children and young acquaintances must feel ashamed of the condition of things in the streets. They knew how these matters were treated in Scotland, and his hon. friend the Member for Flintshire had instanced Sheffield, Manchester, Cardiff, and other large towns as symbolical of what London ought to be. He thought a great deal more ought to be done in London to suppress bad literature, which was very harmful and hurtful to the morals of the young. In these matters they represented their constituencies, who were quite as anxious as they were that something should be done, and it was their duty to urge upon the Government the necessity of doing something to suppress these vices. They were all perfectly well aware of the disgraceful things they saw in shop windows, which were exhibited practically uncontrolled by the police, for they were photographs and drawings of what they deemed impure and immoral. They should strengthen the hands of the Home Secretary in dealing with these matters, and he believed that was the intention of the hon. Member for Flintshire, who did not move this reduction simply to catch a party vote. He congratulated his hon. friend upon bringing forward this motion, and he was glad to hear that he did not intend to put the Committee to the trouble of a division. A great deal more required to be done in the way of suppressing this vice, and he trusted his right hon. friend would not relax his efforts in that direction.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (Yorkshire, W.R., Holmfirth): None of us expect to make people moral by Act of Parliament, but you can do a very great deal to remove temptations to immorality by legislation and administration, and that is all the hon. Member for Flint requires to be done. I want the Home Secretary to make himself acquainted with the administration of some of the large towns in the North of England, and if he does he will find that there are more ways and means under the existing law than those which have been adopted in London. If he would acquaint himself with what is going on in large northern towns he would find a much better state of things, and he would derive very great benefit from it. Action of different kinds has been taken elsewhere to deal with this evil. We are getting more particular every day in regard to the dangers arising from bad food, drink, and milk, and I know not what besides, and I do not see why we should not become more alive to the dangers to the moral and mental condition of the people which now prevail. If the Home Secretary will give me his attention for one single moment I want to impress upon him the necessity of making himself acquainted with the administration adopted in other towns in the North of England where he might get some hints which might be applied with advantage to the administration of London.

MR. SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs): If I understood the reply of the right hon. Gentleman correctly it seems to me to be that so far as the law permits the police are doing all that is possible in London to suppress this evil. If that is the case surely it is a strong reason why the law should be strengthened.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing that point.

MR. SPICER: I am criticising the Home Department in connection with the Home Secretary's powers, and urging that if his powers are not sufficient he should come down to this House and ask permission to strengthen them.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The legislation to which the hon. Member alludes is the action of this House and not the action of the Home Secretary. All that the hon. Member can discuss is the action of the Home Office upon this question.

MR. SPICER: It is very difficult to keep within your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I think we ought to be deeply indebted to the hon. Member for Flintshire for bringing up this matter. We know that it is a disagreeable question, and we who have lived in London all our lives are beginning to be ashamed of the administration of the streets, and we hardly know where to begin to try and remedy the evil. I feel indebted to the hon. Member for Flintshire for having had the moral courage to bring up this question in order that the House may consider it. I trust this debate will not be without influence in stimulating the new borough councils to try and put down this terrible evil.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I do not intend to prolong this debate upon the topic which has been generally discussed, but I think my hon. friend has been amply justified in raising so serious a subject, and no one recognises more than I do the practical work that has been done by the Home Secretary under the several headings he has mentioned, and especially under the Vagrancy Act, and in regard to massage houses where several prosecutions have been undertaken. But I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a certain class of advertisements which are deliberately inserted in newspapers. It is a question which goes to the very root of society, and one which it is most desirable we should check. I am informed that powers do exist for checking and dealing with this evil if sufficient proof is obtainable that these practices are improper and immoral. Immediately after attempting to deal with this question myself I received a large number of communications, and among them was one from a gentleman in the South of England. He had visited his young nephew, and found in his room a heap of disgusting illustrations, and things of the kind to which his hon. friend had referred, and they contained a very large number of those infamous advertisements to which I drew attention at that time, and in which I had the sympathy of the Home Secretary. These people were absolutely making money out of the encouragement of a certain vice by blackmailing unfortunate women. Seeing as I have seen within the last few months these things actually exhibited in shop-windows in many parts of London, I think we ought to have some assurance that this particular matter is engaging the attention of the Home Office, and that some steps are being taken to send special inspectors to investigate cases of this kind. I think we ought to have some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that this question will be dealt with, and if his powers are not sufficient to deal with this class of advertisements which are scattered broadcast all over the country, I think it will be very satisfactory for the House to learn that the question is engaging the attention of the Home Office, and that he will attempt to carry out some legislation to deal with it.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The subject of which the hon. Member has spoken has been engaging my attention. I have had a good deal of advice upon the subject, and I am informed that even where the law is quite sufficient, the difficulty is to procure evidence. So far as the question touches newspaper advertisements, it is a rather serious matter to deal with. I admit that at present I have no remedy, but I have certainly not lost sight of the matter, and I am most anxious to meet what I conceive to be a growing evil. As a matter of fact, I have had more than one draft Bill for the purpose before me; but the difficulties are very great.

*MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg leave to withdraw my motion to divide the House, and I thank the Home Secretary for the sympathy with which he has replied. I believe that very good results will come from this debate. Probably when the Home Secretary has time to deal with the question he will do so, and perhaps he will take into account the remarks of the hon. Member for Battersea in dealing with the delicate work which requires to be done. I beg to thank the House for giving me this opportunity of raising the question.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) said there were one or two other matters in connection with the office of the Home Secretary to which he wished to refer. There was a sum of £65,000, which had been expended upon the inspection of factories and workshops. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would see that the post offices of the country were inspected regularly, properly ventilated, and kept in a sanitary condition. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman could manage to co-operate with the Post Office authorities in this matter. Then there was the item of £315 a year paid to an inspector, and £210 paid to an assistant inspector under the Cruelty to Animals Act. He wished to call attention more particularly to the question of vivisection, which was a very serious one. He believed there were at the London University College twenty gentlemen who were licensed vivisectors. The consequence was that there was a lot of unnecessary torturing of animals and a great many cruelties carried out in these experiments. He understood that some 236 dogs and cats had been operated upon. Some of these animals were allowed to recover consciousness after being disembowelled, and to make observations electricity was applied to the end of the nerves. That was a sort of thing which ought not to be allowed. He did not say that vivisection was not necessary in the interests of medical science, but he did say that the system of torturing dumb animals should either be stopped or minimised as far as possible. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to see that these inspectors did their duty more than they had done in the past. He was afraid that a large amount of cruelty had been carried on, and it was impossible for the inspectors to do their work thoroughly under the system which they adopted. The inspectors ought to make surprise visits to these places, for it was not enough to intimate in advance that they would visit certain places at a certain day and hour, with the result that everything was prepared for the inspector and his assistant. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would give him some assurance that he would have this matter looked into as far as he could, so as to stop this cruelty to dumb animals. On the 20th of March this year he asked the right hon. Gentleman a question as to whether omnibus conductors were empowered by law to demand payment of the fares before the completion of the journey. In regard to these omnibuses, they were constructed to carry twelve persons inside and not thirteen; but when the inspector came inside to look at the tickets there were thirteen passengers, which was one more than the law allowed. Surely it was the duty of the Home Secretary to put an end to this infringement of the law. It was a very serious annoyance to passengers to have to pay their fares before they reach their journey's end. He would like to ask how the right hon. Gentleman would like an inspector to open the door of his carriage and ask him for his carriage licence. He felt that it was a great piece of impertinence on the part of 'bus conductors to demand the fares in advance. It was a practice which was growing in London, and which was getting worse and worse. The conductor had no right to demand payment of the fares in advance. What would they think if when they jumped into a cab the cabman demanded a shilling before he started? In answer to his question on the 20th March the Home Secretary said he had no power to interfere, but he had written to the Commissioner of Police with reference to the payment of 'bus fares in advance, and that official had replied, stating that omnibus conductors were not empowered by law to demand the payment of the fare before the termination of the journey. He wished to know whether the Home Secretary or the Chief Commissioner of Police was right. The inspectors were an intolerable nuisance. When he was asked to show his ticket, he refused to do so, because he objected to play the spy and the detective on omnibus conductors, who worked sixteen or seventeen hours a day at a very small wage. That was not his business, and it was not fair, perhaps, on a cold day when a passenger was buttoned up to the chin to be asked to show his ticket, and to have to take off his gloves to do it. He wanted the Home Secretary to stop that annoyance. It was increasing every day, and by and by people would begin to think it was the law, and perhaps the omnibus proprietors would have a Bill brought before Parliament making it compulsory on passengers to show their tickets. Of course, when it became compulsory he would fall in with the law, as he did in the case of tramway companies, which had Parliamentary powers in the matter. But omnibus inspectors had no right to annoy passengers in that way, and the Home Secretary ought to make it his duty to see that the public were protected from the annoyance, and that they should have as much peace and calm and time for reflection in an omnibus as if they were in their own private carriages. At present there was no peace, and an hon. Member coming down to the House in an omnibus was unable to think over the next move to further the interests of his constituents. He hoped the Home Secretary would not remain dumb like some of his colleagues on the Treasury Bench, because if he did he would be compelled to divide on the Vote. He trusted that he would not be put to such a painful necessity at such a late hour.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: With regard to omnibus conductors, I have already informed the hon. Gentleman that I have no power to interfere. The hon. Gentleman knows that the statutory rights possessed by tramway companies are very different from the rights of omnibus companies. If the hon. Gentleman has any wish to ascertain the law he has the ordinary means of testing it, but I am advised that I cannot interfere officially. As regards the administration of the Vivisection Act I am satisfied, having examined the matter very closely, that with a view to the restraint of cruelty the Act is carried out in accordance with the intention of Parliament. We have endeavoured, and I think with success, to get really good men who understand the work, and take a personal interest in it, to see that the Act is complied with, and, as the hon. Member will see from the Report, surprise visits are frequent. Every care is taken in the issue of licences under the Act.

MR. WEIR said the right hon. Gentleman had given no information with reference to inspectors on omnibuses. The omnibuses were only licensed by Scotland Yard to carry twelve passengers inside, and when an inspector came in he broke the law by making the thirteenth, and it was the duty of the conductor to hand him over to the nearest policeman. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that he might take an action at common law, but who would incur law costs in such a matter? Passengers should be protected from annoyance by the authority issuing the licences, and as the right hon. Gentleman had not given any answer on the point, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £50.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £96,357, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Weir.)

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside) said he hoped his hon. friend would not press his motion to a division. It was always a luxury for him to vote against a Minister's salary, but he could not accept that luxury at the price offered by his hon. friend. The request of his hon. friend for peace and quiet in a London omnibus was a supreme joke. It was a very good thing that passengers should be asked for their fares during the journey. What an abominable nuisance it would be if every passenger had to pay his fare at, for instance, the Bank. That was really asking too much, and if his hon. friend pressed the motion to a division he would certainly vote against him. With reference to inspectors, what inconvenience did they cause to the ordinary passenger? He would not vote for the reduction of the right hon. Gentleman's salary because certain hon. Members thought that all the fares should be collected at the end of the journey, and because they objected to omnibus inspectors.

MR. WEIR said he was really surprised at his hon. friend. If he had lived as many years in London as he had he would not have talked as he did. He did not object so much to the conductor asking for the fare, but he objected strongly to the inspectors. His hon. friend might vote against him if he liked, but he would stand on principle, and he would continue to do so as long as he was a Member of the House of Commons.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough) said in his opinion his hon. friend the Member for Ross and Cromarty had reason for complaint, and he could not take the view of his hon. friend the Member for the Brightside Division. He travelled on a line of 'buses from the Monument to Brixton, and no fares were taken until the end of the journey, and no inconvenience was caused.

Original Question proposed.

MR. WEIR: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, there is a Member in the Aye lobby who refuses to vote.

*THE CHAIRMAN: If an hon. Member refuses to vote there is no power to make him vote.

MR. WEIR: He remains in the lobby.

DR. TANNER (Cork County, Mid) said that a large amount of money was being taken under the Vote. He observed that the salary of the legal assistant was £1,500, whereas it was only £1,460 last year. He referred to the matter because he desired that expenditure should be cut down———

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.
